WASHINGTON, Sunday, May 17.

The following dispatch has just been received at the War Department, (11 o'clock P. M.:)

WILLIAMSBURG, May 17.

To Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

The gunboats Galena, Monitor, Aroostook, Naugatuck and Fort Royal, were repulsed from Fort Darling, seven miles below Richmond, yesterday. A portion of them have returned to Jamestown Island, near this place, in James River.

Lieut. Mecaw, commanding the Fort Royal, sent overland to me this morning for intelligence regarding the condition of the fleet below the island, and also to assist in burying the dead, which he brought down with him. Seventeen have been interred on the banks of the river, and there are a number of the wounded on board, including Lieut. Mecaw.

The 100-pound gun of the Naugatuck exploded on the first fire. (Signed)

HEADQUARTERS SIXTH DIVISION, HEADQUARTERS OF THE ROAD TO RICHMOND, 20 MILES FROM WILLIAMSBURGH, Sunday Night, May 11, 1862.

Last Friday morning the advance guard of the grand army took up the line of march from Williamsburgh to a point further up the Peninsula. The morning was a beautiful one, and before the sun gave us its first light Gen. Sumner's entire Division, with all its artillery, ammunition and baggage wagons, was this side of Fort Magruder, and all the successive fortifications of Williamsburgh. The army marched as one flushed with victory. It moved in solid strength, as if conscious that it possessed all needed resources to overcome whatever might oppose it. More than thirty miles of the embattled way of the grand battle through which they had just passed, and of which they were the heroes, and in the time of this observation it was easily perceived that the troops were filled with a measure of contempt for the rebel soldiery they had never known before. With the exception of a very few of the officers we captured as prisoners of war, no savvy a looking set of men were never seen. Starvation and misery were depicted on the faces of the rebel prisoners in a style rivaling the picture of Famine in the "Court of Death," while their worn and tattered clothes were only fit for the fatigue dress of a regiment of ragpickers. Our troops could not help contrasting their own appearance with that of their enemy, and thanking their good fortune that under the protection of the old flag they were able to enjoy a soldier's needed comforts and to gratify a soldier's pride in arms and in uniform. The day continued as the morning promised—clear and warm. A march of fourteen miles was easily performed, and for once in the history of the movements of the army of the Potomac the roads were in a state to permit the baggage-wagons to keep up. We passed by and through several beautiful farms, and across magnificent acres of wheat. While the farmers of New-England are just getting ready to sow their wheat, it is here in most of the fields a foot high and promising an abundant crop. Fields of rye and three hundred acres, all looking evenly and well, are common; but the fences are down, and cattle and horses are roaming through them at leisure. The rails, moss-covered and ancient, which have been their protection for a century, have cooked the steaks and boiled the coffee of many weary soldiers. Virginia, in assuming anew after peace is declared, will have a nice time of it in fencing herself in.

In passing up the Peninsula we find many deserted houses. Historians relate that during the Revolution, when the British soldiers passed, they entered dwellings, destroying the glass, crockery, furniture and paintings, and stealing, and carrying off without mercy, everything they could, and then making a bonfire of what was left. The people have been told that as our army advanced, the same scenes would be repeated. Instead of that, those who remain at home are agreeably surprised to find guards placed around each house near our encampments, and whatever of forage is taken is all receipted for. Our encampment for the first night was in large fields fringed with woods, and near brooks and springs. As soon as arms were stacked and knapsacks thrown off, officers and private alike, sought a grassy bed beneath some large tree.

"Hardtack and tightness fogy" was in order. Sleep was much more grateful than coffee, and had it not been for a speaker of interest on the ground, plentiful as leaves in Vallambrosa, the rest would have been splendid. Aside from the march, the day passed without any special event.

The next morning before daylight, the march was resumed, and after another splendid day we encamped for the night at this place. The Sabbath has been emphatically a day of rest, and the soldiers will be prepared for whatever duties may be upon them to-morrow. It does not do to push an army ahead too fast. You get too far away from your supplies. Rations are exhausted, and without rest and rations, soldiers soon become outnumbered.

At this point, Saturday morning, Gen. SUMNER, with one battalion of the Sixth Cavalry, had a skirmish with the rear guard of the enemy, said to be the Texas Rangers. We lost five killed and some fourteen wounded. The enemy's loss was much greater. This skirmish affords a painful lesson to one of the character of a portion of the Southern army, and shows to what depths of inhuman wickedness men, or fiends, can descend. Prisoners taken by the rebels were afterward deliberately murdered and the fingers of our dead cut off to secure rings. We grow wiser every day. Forbearance may be a virtue equally with patience, but I shall not wonder that if hereafter there is less regard for the rebel soldiers' cry for mercy at the hands of our troops on the battle-field.

It seems evident from all that can be gathered of the enemy's movements that he is massing an immense force near Richmond, and that somewhere near there he will await our coming; but whether we are to go there or not is given more than I am permitted to say. The army is in fine condition and spirits, and ready to go anywhere and fight any number.

We are thirty-six miles from Richmond—much nearer than any portion of the army has been heretofore.

The Rebel Retreat a Necessity—Their Supplies Burning Since—Treatment of the Negroes—Search for Concealed Weapons.

CAMP AT WILLIAMSBURGH, VIA FORT MONROE, SEVENTH DIVISION, Monday, May 12, 1862.

Intercourse with the inhabitants still remaining in this ancient town develops the fact that the removal of the rebel forces from here, as well as Yorktown, was not only a military but a physical necessity. In less than three weeks, they would have exhausted all the supplies which they could command. The town, built on the bank in the interior as their rule extends in this State, has contributed its utmost measure to maintenance of the rebel army, and the prospect is only gloom, desolation and barrenness. The vast fields and gardens are promising but a harvest of bitter herbs and weeds.

The wheat-field in which we are encamped, of about 200 acres, is the first indication of preparatory husbandry that has been seen thus far on our peninsular route, and this is being fast destroyed by our horses and trampling feet. The display they made of their shipping on the York River was but an empty show to effect a favorable impression upon us, and the commissary stores left by them at Yorktown was a necessity forced upon them through a want of adequate transportation, and was far from being repeated at Williamsburgh. Unground corn was found in their haversacks and pockets after the battle, and no vestige remained of nutriment of any other sort. The inhabitants were compelled to secrete much of their provisions from the enemy long before they abandoned their strongholds, and these will soon disappear before the rapacity of the slave women and children left behind.

The inhabitants, most of those who had means, abandoned the place on the first intimation of the evacuation of Yorktown; and it was the intention of the rebels to burn the place, should the defenses at the front prove powerless to stay the advance of our army. But rapid and close pressure upon their rear frustrated the design, not, however, until the attempt was made. Three or four buildings were fired, but quickly extinguished by the negroes.

Five thousand negroes were said to have been marched through the town with their army, and the bareness of some of the leaders is almost too atrocious for belief. An aged negro told me, to-day, with hot tears coursing down his withered cheeks, that, in 1860, his master gave him and his family their freedom, and presented them with a small estate, sufficient to render them comfortable through life, with proper culture; but during the present year his homestead had been seized, and his wife and children, as well as himself, sold, separated and scattered, to contribute to the prosecution of this rebellion. Other facts are daily unfolding themselves to testimony that this is no isolated instance of the barbarity practiced by these chivalric rebels.

The few white females who resolutely remained behind behold with wonder the safety of their little worn-out town. They were promised a most delectable feast of indiscriminate cruelty, and outrage and destruction, in case we found our way hither. We were a horde of unprincipled interdemalizers, plundering, and burning, and destroying like a plague wherever our hands were laid. It was our purpose and for what we fought, and they are really astonished and disappointed that the prophecy is not realized. In vain we endeavor to convince them of their delusion. They retort with the implication that we dare not—that our Northern cities would be laid in ashes before the smoking ruins of this town should cease to burn.

No indignities whatever are offered the townspeople, and we hear of a few instances of returning reason and loyalty. But upon the whole, Williamsburgh is the most rabid secession neighborhood we have yet visited.

Deaths are occurring frequently among our wounded, and the mortality yet to ensue among them will yet be large. The weather is becoming hot during the day and cool at night. The hospitals selected for the sick and wounded are large, clean and airy, and the patients are doing as well as the nature of their complaints will allow. The wounded rebel prisoners receive the unremitting attention of the ladies here, who bring them many little delicacies and comforts.

Our Stars and Stripes float over William and Mary's College, but claim little attention from the inhabitants. The place is to be searched for concealed arms. It is supposed many are hid in the houses. Several rifles and muskets have been found in various quarters, and two cannon have been reclaimed from hiding places in the suburbs. Cannon balls, grape, canister and shell are found here and there, scattered about in the public buildings and other places. Cot-beds, for hospital use, abound here in great quantities, and the town seems to have been made a military depôt. Gun-carriages were also made here, a building having been erected for the purpose since the breaking out of the war. ARGUS.

A Day of Rest—A Review of the Week's Work—Gen. Sumner's Attack—Fifteen Miles of Richmond—Skirmishes on the Way.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

MOUNT PLEASANT FEMALE SEMINARY, NEAR BARHAMSVILLE, VA., SUNDAY NIGHT, May 11, 1862.

Our army, or so much of it as is under my observation in this vicinity, has been enjoying a day of rest after the labors of the week. They are fairly entitled to it, for they have endured much, and accomplished much, in the last seven days. How rapidly has history been preparing to our hands during that time, and we scarcely conscious of the real significance of the events in which we have been the actors. Each day has been an era; each hour an epoch; and if the coming seven days fulfill the promise of the last, this fortnight's record is to figure more largely in American annals than any other of the year.

Movements have, indeed, hastened so rapidly, that it has been impossible to give them with sufficient detail to secure clearness and accuracy of description, or to render equal justice to all for the share they have had in the week's work. Where the commanding General, in his dispatches, has failed in this, it was hardly to be expected that we letter-writers should be found faultless. There is a limit to the capacity of even an army correspondent, and the best of us have fallen far short of the demand upon us, since our army commenced its march from before Yorktown. We needed to be superior to the necessities of food and rest, and to be endowed with the more than human gift of omnipresence, properly to grasp and fitly to record the swiftly moving events of the period.

A review of what has been hastily written, shows that some have not been duly considered for the share they had in the important engagement of Monday, whose history cannot be correctly written without dealing more harshly, perhaps, than charity would warrant, with men whose worst crime is the lack of capacity equal to their position. Much as was accomplished that day, the results fell far short of what had been possible with more of promptness and decision where it was most needed. An earlier arrival of Gen. McCLELLAN would have settled the fate of the day in season to have enabled our army to have followed up their victory that night, instead of waking to find the enemy gone in the morning. But his coming at last was fortunate, and the promptness with which he comprehended the condition of affairs, and made his dispositions accordingly, was sure evidence of good generalship.

But it was not possible for him in a moment to learn all that had been done that day, and hence it is that his first hasty dispatches fail to cover sufficient ground to give general satisfaction. That was a noble charge of HAWKES's, and doubtless secured the key of the enemy's position, but it should not be forgotten that it was not until he was reinforced by the first brigade of Gen. CASEY's Division, under Gen. PECK, that he found himself sufficiently strong to drive the enemy finally from his works. Nor should the day's work of HOOKER, PARKE and others on the left have been passed by with scarcely a reference. The list of killed and wounded will show how desperate was the struggle there.

But the false statements of Monday's action that have appeared before this will remove much of the dissatisfaction created here by the first hasty dispatches, in regard to the battle of Williamsburgh, which have just returned to us. So I dismiss the subject, for events move too hastily to give us time to linger.

The report comes to-day that Gen. SUMNER, with his forces, is within fifteen miles of Richmond—or seven miles, according to another statement. Besides a force of cavalry, he has a battalion of light horse artillery and two of the best infantry regiments in the army—the Second Rhode Island, Col. P. WHIPPLE, and the Ninety-eighth Pennsylvania, Col. BALLARD. Gen. SUMNER commenced this expedition, which has been pressing hard upon the rear of the retreating rebels, keeping up a perpetual fire of skirmishers all along the way.

One fight occurred on Thursday night, at Richmondville, near here, and six miles from West Point, on the road from Williamsburgh. Six of our men were murdered in this affair; the enemy's loss is not to be ascertained. On Friday, two of Gen. SUMNER's men were killed, and three or four wounded, in another affair a little further on the road. As a single shell from our battery is known to have killed a rebel Colonel, Major and fourteen privates, and twenty-nine dead Confederates were left upon the field, the enemy's loss may be reasonably judged to have been much greater. They took two of our cavalry prisoners during the engagement, and finding themselves hard pressed afterward, tied them to a tree, and deliberately shot them. So I learn at the headquarters of Gen. KEYES, in whose command the infantry portion of the force belongs. I hear of still a third skirmish between Kent and Cumberland, on Saturday, of which no particulars have yet come to hand.

At last accounts, Gen. SUMNER was near Cumberland, and it is supposed that he has occupied that place before this. PIERREPONT.

THE FIGHT AT WEST POINT.

The following extracts from a private letter give additional particulars of the fight at West Point:

"I have not heard from you for some time, though I receive the papers irregularly. While in Yorktown, we could purchase them for ten cents a copy. Even at that price, it was hardly safe for one of the readers (mounted on a mule,) to pass through our camp, for he would be quickly surrounded, and almost torn to pieces, so eager were our soldiers to get the news, and see what is said of them by the New-York Press.

You will see in the paper that our division was not engaged at Williamsburgh, as it remained in reserve at Yorktown until Thursday, when we embarked on board a steamer to join Gen. FRANKLIN's Division at West Point, the whole to be under command of Gen. FRANCIS PORTER, Gen. MEAGHER being in command of our division.

We spent nearly twenty-four hours very pleasantly on board the steamboat (one of the California line;) had a good supper and a comfortable night, with the luxury of a mattress and feather pillow; and upon rising in the morning, found we had reached our destination, viz.: West Point. After breakfast, we disembarked in pontoon boats. Found the land low and swampy, and had some difficulty in approaching the shore on account of the shallowness of the water.

We were a day too late to participate in an affair of FRANKLIN's Division. The enemy, the day before, had made his appearance in considerable force, and made a desperate attempt to open a retreat by cutting his way through our forces, or driving them into the river, so as to cross over to White House—a point on the Pamunkey River—from whence they could take the case for Richmond. After a desperate engagement, one of our regiments (the Thirty-first, the same which was with us in the Park Barracks,) were cut up very badly. We saw about thirty of our dead men laying unburied in a barn, a short distance from the water, one of them a Captain in the Thirty-first, I remember very well.

Here the rebels were guilty of barbarous atrocities. Many of the dead had their throats cut, and presented a horrible spectacle. One man was brought in who had had his eyes picked out by their bayonets. In short, they evinced the most unrelenting fury on finding this way of retreat cut off to them. Our troops eventually drove them back with considerable slaughter, and they sought some other road of escape.

* * * * * *

P. S.—I have just heard some further particulars of the fight here. One company of the Thirty-first was entirely cut off, a flank company. It seems the Colonel of the Thirty-first, anxious to bring his regiment into action, advanced boldly into the woods, neglecting to throw out skirmishers. The rebels kept themselves concealed until they were within a few paces, then rose up and gave them a volley with deadly effect. One of the flank companies became separated from the rest of the regiment in the difficult ground, and found they were engaged with negroes, who called upon them to surrender, but the Captain said "he would be d—d if he would surrender to niggers." The men, getting fast in the swamp, got out of almost to a man. Numbers of them were found with their throats cut, and some had their eyes picked out. One was found tied to a tree. But enough of these horrors—I must conclude."

AFFAIRS IN RICHMOND AND NORFOLK.

From the Baltimore Clipper, of Saturday.

By the arrival of a gentleman yesterday from Norfolk, Va., we learn several facts of interest to the public. He states that the grand army of Gen. McCLELLAN is slowly but surely making its way to Richmond, and before another Sunday rolls around, the brave Union soldiers will have full possession of the rebel Capital.

The rebels are destroying everything that they cannot carry away, and are evacuating Richmond with all possible dispatch. So confident are the residents of Richmond of the Federal soldiers assuming possession of the city, that several desperate street fights have occurred, caused by Union men expressing their joy at the expectation of a speedy release from tyranny.

The city for the past week has been in a fearful condition; men are knocked down in open day with billies, ladies are assaulted; in fact, our informant likened the state of things to pandemonium.

The main body of the rebels disputing the passage of Gen. McCLELLAN are skulking away, first destroying the bridges on the route to Richmond. We suppose that the next information received of the chivalry, they will be encamped in a swamp somewhere in South Carolina.

The residents of Richmond are momentarily expecting the arrival of our gunboats at their city. It was rumored in Richmond that the river was full of infernal machines, which are to blow sky-high our fleet. It is also said that several Union men have been imprisoned for attempting to destroy a number of the torpedoes.

Affairs in Norfolk are beginning to assume a cheerful aspect, as represented by our informant. It must, indeed, be pleasant to listen to the Union men there; they have had their necks under the iron heel for upward of a year, and now that they are freemen, they would joyfully join the ranks of our army, if an opportunity presented itself.

Business is reviving, and Main-street begins to wear its usual business appearance. The ladies, who kept themselves housed during the occupancy of the city by the rebel soldiers, now promenade the streets, with all the gayety possible. Instances, however, occur where the dear creatures will turn up their pugnoses at the Federal soldiers. No notice is taken of these insults, and it is amusing sometimes to witness with what a swing the females betake themselves off.

The Judgeship of the Supreme Court, Seventh District, made vacant by the death of Judge KING, it is understood, was tendered to JAMES C. SMITH and HENRY R. WALLACE, both of whom declined. IMPORTANT FROM THE SOUTH.

Pensacola Evacuated by the Rebels.

ACCOUNTS IN THE MEMPHIS PAPERS.

The Evacuation of Yorktown and Norfolk Strategical Movements.

Condition of the Rebel Army at Corinth.

Reports of Yellow Fever in New-Orleans.

CAIRO, Saturday, May 17.

The steamer Diligent, from Hickman, brought up a second load of refugees from Memphis and other points South, to-day. All tell the same story of hardships endured in traveling on foot through the woods and swamps, and subsisting on such provisions as could be carried in their pockets. The party is almost entirely composed of men in the prime of life. They bring Memphis papers of the 13th.

We learn from the telegraphic columns of these papers that Pensacola was evacuated on the 12th. On the morning of that day the batteries of Santa Rosa Island, together with the fleet, commenced shelling the works, but no response was made. After a short but vigorous cannonade, a flag of truce was sent ashore to discover the cause. No enemy whatever was found. The National troops were to take possession the following day. No mention is made of the direction taken by the rebels.

Memphis papers contain accounts of the late naval engagement, and deny the loss of any boats, though they confess that the fleet was badly cut up.

The evacuation of Yorktown and Norfolk are pronounced strategetical movements, by no means indicating a rebel defeat. Williamsburgh is claimed as a rebel victory. According to their accounts the Yankees were repulsed with great loss.

Refugees say that officers from Corinth, who are frequently in Memphis, complain bitterly of the loss the Southern cause sustained by the delay of Gen. BRAGG in making an attack upon them. BEAUREGARD has been ready for a month, but BRAGG was not ready for him. He has received all the reinforcements that it is possible for him to procure, excepting raw levies, while sickness rages throughout his camp to an alarming extent.

BEAUREGARD has placed an imperative embargo on letter writing from his camp. No soldier is permitted to send any written communication to his friends.

The Union people in Memphis, are counted nearly distracted at the delay of our fleet. Many in anticipation of their arrival, have been convinced to the existence of Union sentiments, which get them into serious trouble.

It is asserted that the fleet will have no difficulty after passing Fort Wright and the rebel fleet.

The whole country for one hundred miles below Corinth has been swept to obtain supplies for the rebel army, and is now nearly exhausted. Serious embarrassments from this cause are anticipated.

CAIRO, Saturday, May 17.

The Memphis Appeal of the 11th contains a letter from a correspondent, who says that in the late naval engagement, the rebel loss was 8 killed and 16 wounded.

BATON ROUGE, Friday, May 16.

The Memphis Avalanche of the 12th contains the following:

"FORT PILLOW, 12th—We fought the enemy with four of our lightest boats one hour and a half. We sunk one gunboat and two mortarboats. Our loss is two killed and eight wounded. That of the enemy is very heavy, as our sharpshooters literally mowed them down. We fought side by side with the enemy. Not one shot passed through our breastworks. Our upper works are riddled, but we are ready to fight again. We will be able to hold the river."

Speaking of the fall of Norfolk, the Avalanche says: "But worse than all, the Virginia, on which we so confidently rested, was burnt at Craney Island on Saturday night. Such is the tenor of brief, but painful intelligence flashed over the wires."

There were three cases of yellow-fever at New-Orleans at last accounts, two at the Charity Hospital and one in the French Hospital.

The Avalanche says it has been formally decided that Savannah is never to be surrendered.

The Provost-Marshal of Memphis has received instructions from the military authorities to take Confederate notes as currency, and to arrest as disloyal all persons who refuse to receive them in ordinary business transactions.

The gunboats in the late attack on Commodore FOOTE's flotilla were commanded by MONTGOMERY, assisted by Jeff. THOMPSON.

Flour was quoted at $10, $11 and $12. Bacon, 20c. for sides and hams. Sugar, 6c. Molasses, 35c. Of Cotton and Tobacco, no sales, receipts or shipments. Corn, $1 60. Oats, $1 25.

"Notwithstanding the Federal progress," says the Avalanche, "we feel all confidence that MAGRUDER will get to Richmond some time before McCLELLAN." "Advances," it thinks, "are our real and best security." It urges moneyholders to invest in real estate.

Arrangements have been effected between Gens. HALLECK and BRAYERMAN for an exchange of Surgeons. One hundred and fourteen prisoners were sent on by BRAYERMAN, to-day, under a flag of truce, borne by Col. FERRAN, of the army of Western Virginia. Not only these prisoners, but others, have been confined at Columbus, Miss. Some of them were taken in Missouri last Summer. Before leaving Corinth one of their number was recognized by one of FERR's men as a member of the Twenty-fifth Illinois, paroled at Lexington, and BRAYERMAN ordered him to be heavily ironed.

Gov. MORTON and Adjt.-Gen. NOBLE, of Indiana, arrived to-day.

CHICAGO, Saturday, May 17.

A special from Cairo says:

The steamer Shanghai, with forty Memphis refugees, has arrived. They report that hundreds of others are making their way North as they best can.

A dispatch from the fleet, received to-day, says that deserters state that the rebel flotilla has been reinforced by the arrival of a new ram called the Gen. Price, and the iron-clad gunboat Arkansas, from Memphis.

Jeff. THOMPSON has landed a part of his forces on the Arkansas shore, and a demonstration against our land forces was made on Wednesday night, and our pickets driven in. The enemy now hold part of the point.

DEPARTMENT OF THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

Inactivity and its Results—The Rebels Scour Through a Rendezvous—Washing, but no Prayer.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times:

WASHINGTON, Saturday, May 17.

The following, from your correspondent, dated this day, has been received:

Nothing of interest has occurred in this department lately. The regiments are becoming almost disorganized, and gradually assuming that positive expression of repose commonly attributed to Indian camps. The rebels, on the opposite side of the river, near Port Royal, seem to be busy.

A son of a returned prisoner, who was led through their camps blindfolded, reports a force of at least forty thousand men. He was probably led through the same camp in several directions.

The railroad is near completion, and direct communication will soon be established with Aquia Creek.

Yesterday was the day of fasting prescribed by the President and Medical Director of the Confederate States. The fasting was completely observed on both sides the River, but prayer on neither. G. H. W.

FROM GEN. CEARY'S COMMAND.

A Skirmish at Linden, on the Manassas Gap Railroad.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, May 17.

The following is extracted from a dispatch to the Secretary of War by Col. JOHN W. GEARY, dated RECTORTOWN, Va., May 16:

A company of infantry of my command was yesterday ordered to Linden, to remain stationed there. A detachment of seventeen men, guard to the company wagon, reached there a short time before the main body of the company, which was on a train. They were attacked by a body of cavalry, variously estimated at from 300 to 500, coming upon them from four directions. Our men resisted them, keeping up a sharp firing under shelter of the dépôt, which was riddled with bullets. My men were overpowered. One was killed and fourteen taken prisoners, three of whom were wounded, when the enemy hastily retired under fire and with some loss. I have been informed that a portion of Gen. SUMNER' command had a skirmish with them.

The Asia arrived at Queenstown on the evening of the 6th inst., and at Liverpool on the afternoon of the 7th.

The London Times of the 9th, in an editorial on American affairs, says:

"Sooner or later the Federal forces must be actually collected, and then will come the test of public feeling. So long as the Federals are not absolutely winners, they are losers; whereas, so long as the Confederates are not actually subdued they may regard themselves as winning. There are considerations which counterbalance the superiority of the North in its resources and magnitude of its armies."

An occasional correspondent of the Times, writing from New-York, says:

"The whole army of the Confederates is reported to consist of 400,000 men, of whom 200,000 are said to be raw recruits. According to Southern accounts this army would number 717,000 on the 1st of May. The same writer also adduces evidence to show that all the Southerners do not like burning up their cotton, some of them having voluntarily made sales to Northern merchants."

A Liverpool correspondent of the Times undertakes to explain the difficulties of Gen. McCLELLAN's army before Yorktown, and says they are so great that probably McDOWELL's operations may be connected into the main attack.

Capt. WINSOR, who, with the assistance of his crew and steward, recovered his ship, the Emilie St. Pierre, from a Federal prize crew, was on the 5th presented with a service of plate and a gold chronometer, which had been subscribed for by a number of Liverpool merchants and others, who desire to mark their sense of the courage and tact which the daring seaman had evinced in overcoming two officers and sixteen men belonging to the Northern cruiser, the James Adger. He was also presented with a medal on behalf of his own crew, who have been sent home from Arcadia, while the steward and cook each received a purse of twenty guineas. The Mercantile Marine Association of Liverpool had decided to have a gold medal struck for the Captain and a silver one for each of the crew.

The owners of the Emilie St. Pierre have made Capt. WINSOR a present of £2,000, and it is stated that they also intend to provide handsomely for his companions—one of whom is an Irishman and the other a German.

The number of season ticket holders at the Great Exhibition on Saturday, the 3d inst., was estimated at 12,000.

The London Critic says:

"Mr. GEORGE HARGRAVE, editor of the London American, has resigned his office in order to give his attention exclusively to American law and agency business in London. The editorial conduct of the American will hereafter be under the sole direction of Mr. A. W. BURTON, who has had the principal management of that department during the past year, when Mr. HARGRAVE was away on a visit to the United States."

The Times' City Article says that the completion of the Russian loan affords evidence of the little influence which the merely speculative element can exercise upon any operation, intrinsically supported by the solid capitalists of London and the Continent. Probably the list of applicants for the present loan constitutes a larger proportion of monied substance than was ever before obtained in any analogous case.

The Daily News' city article says that the correct particulars of the Russian loan subscription will probably not be permitted to transpire in the frank and explicit manner necessary, as the Stock Exchange Committee refuses to let the shares of a public company be quoted, unless two-thirds of the capital be subscribed. The Committee should, in the case of the Russian loan, enforce all the publicity desirable.

The Paris Patrie, of the 4th inst., asserts that M. MASSIEU, the French Minister to Washington, had a long conference with JEFFERSON DAVIS at Richmond, and that the step taken by M. MASSIEU is entirely of a political character, and is known by President LINCOLN. The same journal states that Gen. OTERO will shortly be nominated a Senator.

Prince NAPOLEON was about to proceed to Spain.

It was reported that GARIBALDI had resigned the command of the Genoese Volunteers, and it was believed that the corps would be disbanded.

Victor EMANUEL still continued at Naples. After having visited the French fleet, the King addressed a letter to the Emperor Napoleon, thanking him for his courtesy toward himself, and his sympathy for the Italian cause.

The King says:

"It is long since I have experienced so much emotion as I have to-day. The order which reigns in the Southern Provinces, and the earnest manifestation that which I everywhere receive, bear testimony to the submission of my subjects. We must convince Europe that the idea of unity rests on solid bases, and is thoroughly graven on the hearts of all Italians."

The King also, while thanking a Neapolitan deputation, which waited upon him with an address, said:

"Public safety is not yet reinstituted, because Rome is the centre of conspiracies; but believe me when I say that, much as the Italians wish to recover Rome, the French wish quite as much to dominate their occupation of it."

The Pope returned to Rome on the 5th. A large crowd assembled as he passed through the streets.

A Spanish squadron would sail shortly, with troops for Cuba, ready to replace the sick of the Spanish Army in Mexico, or to reinforce it if necessary.

As the people were leaving the Church of the Cross, after divine service, at Warsaw, on the 4th, twenty-two arrests were made by the police, on account of some forbidden songs having been sung with the sacred music. Among the persons arrested were a few women. A slight conflict took place with the police. The patrols had been doubled.

Bombay letters of April 12, and Calcutta, April 3, had reached England.

The news has been mainly anticipated. The statement that the Nana is alive is categorically denied by the Englishmen.

The conspiracy at Hyderabad was being unravelled.

The Brazilian mails (already telegraphed from Lisbon) had reached Southampton.

Peace had been permanently established in the Argentine Republic.

Commercial news anticipated.

THE FRENCH MEDIATION.

AN ENGLISH SEMI-OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

From the Edinburgh Scotsman.

Private information from Paris, coinciding with

[illegible] to the conviction that a strong Centre to make an effort toward some kind of intervention has long been entertained by the Emperor, and that, unless some settlement shall have been reached or brought within sight a few weeks hence, he will scarcely be restrained from the attempt. If, when the advance of the season renders military movements impracticable in the Southern States, at least by Northern troops, the position of the belligerents shall be anything like what it was at the last adverse, or if instead the position is not much more adverse than it would now be rational to expect, the Note will be regarded as meaning, in the absence of any new element, another year's war. Against such a result, it is maintained that the French Emperor is now more than ever inclined not only to protest but to act. More than probable, he will first propose to move in concert with Great Britain—but we may assume, at least in passing, that any such proposal would be declined by our Government. The Emperor would, in [illegible], act by himself. He will, perhaps, begin by a more friendly remonstrance, addressed ostensibly to both parties, but practically meant or needed only for the North—a remonstrance which there is desperately little chance of producing any effect beyond, as the best, a civil expression of resentment [illegible]. The course to which the Emperor would then resort is believed to be this—he would throw out something quite capable of being interpreted as a threat against whichever party should resume hostilities; and he would then formally propound an advice that the whole matter should be referred to a Congress of twenty Sovereignties, not by the votes not to be taken en masse, but each State to vote separately, (whether for itself or whether it desires reunion under one federal or central government, or reconstruction under two or more such governments.) Whether or not the visit of the French Minister at Washington to the Confederate Government at Richmond has any connection with those intentions, is matter only of unfounded conjecture; but there is more than conjecture as to something like what has been indicated being, at present, not only the desire of the design of the French Government. The prospect is not a cheerful one. Though the proposal of referring the matter to universal suffrage is one which, in itself, is rather to recommend in France than here, we would be unreasonable in the States to accuse the Emperor of having proposed what he have done over again what the Confederate Congress did in the Spring of last year. They did then, as they would again do now, vote themselves out of the Union—and that is just the result against which the North has been fighting. In a word, for the North to accede to the French proposal would just be certainly, though indirectly, to concede separation. It is difficult to conceive that that which the North has refused and resisted at such enormous cost, it would grant at the bequest or menace of France; and it is equally difficult to see what effective steps France could take were the demand denied. To this country, there would be no course open to her but inaction and almost silence. We have no right to venture beyond friendly advice; and the fact that our interests are deeply concerned in a speedy settlement of the American strife, subject to suspicion and aversion anything we could do, would tend to diminish and respectfulness and force. A collation of the recent accounts, public and private, regarding the war, tend to strengthen the conclusion that the struggle will not be ended this campaign, and, consequently, that the state of things for which the French Emperor is understood to wait will not [illegible].

A BUSINESS VIEW OF THE MATTER.

From the London Economist.

The journey of M. MERCIER, the French Minister at Washington, to Richmond, the present seat of the Confederate Government, has doubtless a grave political intention, though what intention, or whose intention, it is not easy to know. Very probably M. Mercier has no precise or definite instructions from the Government on the subject. It is indeed stated that he has on several occasions asserted that his Government has intrusted him with an ample discretion, and it may not improbably be that he is at present the sole director of that discretion. The French Emperor well knows the occasional advantage of a vague and ambiguous and we do not doubt that M. Mercier well knows what he thinks is his Government, though he may not have precise and authoritative intimations respecting them. Up to the present time, M. Mercier has always been very prudent at Washington, and has always used friendly language to the Federal cause. Even now we believe he has intimated that he only wishes to explain to the Confederates the strength of their enemies, and the necessity of some submission, but how far such language is to be literally and entirely believed is a difficult thesis, on which very much might be said if it were respectful to say it.

There can be no doubt that the French Emperor would gladly see the American civil war ended if it were possible. We should all be glad to see it ended. All Europe, with trivial exceptions, believes that the present struggle can have no good end; that it is a dire evil, and according to the statements of its most conservative and intelligent expounders, an attempt to perpetuate by force a Union which can, in truth, be maintained only by good will. We are suffering great evils from this struggle; we are about to suffer much greater, we are about—though as yet we have escaped the full extent—to suffer much more acutely and much more extensively than we have suffered for years. We do so from an attachment to moral principle, and a conscientious adherence to International law. But we are not equally sure that these motives would be equally influential on the other side of the Channel. The French cotton manufacture is not comparable to ours, but it is nevertheless very considerable and important. A much smaller amount of commercial uneasiness produces, in France, more political uneasiness than is understood here. The foundations of political society are very much weaker, and every one has there the mischievous habit of expecting Government to intervene in every misery. If any practicable intervention of the French Government would effectually close the American civil war, and assuage the French suffering which that war occasions and threatens to cause, sooner or later that Government would intervene. The Emperor would perhaps not be dissuaded to it, and the people would support it.

But is there any such practicable, easy, conclusive intervention? We fear not. It is certainly possible for the French Emperor to send a fleet which would open the cotton ports, which would protect the coasts of the South from the expeditions of the North. But would this conclude the struggle? That fleet could not remain there forever. It could not calm the passions now aroused; it would not mitigate them; it might intensify them. As soon as it is withdrawn, the North and South would stand opposed as before, with the same deadly animosities in the same circumstances. Would not the war break out afresh? Would not the intervention leave at its close a keener hatred and a more angry struggle than it found at its commencement?

In the face of this plain difficulty, we do not expect that the French Emperor will really intervene in the North. We think there is much more than a hazard to be opposed to such a course, not only in a matter of very delicate and difficult nature, but in a matter of very doubtful success. But we have no doubt he would like to be busy in the matter. The French policy is always restless, and it is not disagreeable to the French temper to take a part in all the great affairs of a complicated world. M. Mercier may propose some mediation, draw out some outline of a compromise, suggest some shadowy arrangement in conformity with European opinion. Such mediation would not probably be successful. On the contrary, the North would still insist on union, and the South would still insist on disunion. Even when this great issue is once solved, there are a host of minor topics of debt, territory, and mutual relations adequate to be pretences for fiery wars, if pretences were required. No mediation now could settle those controversies between infuriated combatants who have not yet ascertained their relative military strength. But it is very likely that M. Mercier may offer such a mediation, and in all discussions upon the American civil war we must bear in mind that the active interference of the French Emperor is a latent possibility which should never be omitted from our calculations, though the perpetual presence of so fitful an element must necessarily tend to perplex and further confuse a problem which, even without that addition, was sufficiently arduous.

AN ABSTRACT SPECULATION.

From the Saturday Review.

The rumored journey of M. MERCIER, French Minister at Washington, to the Confederate headquarters at Richmond, may perhaps indicate the readiness of the Federal Government to commence a negotiation. It is probable that, for the present, the restoration of the Union and of the Constitution would be the only terms offered by the President; but if Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS showed a conciliatory disposition, some compromise might be devised which would put an end to the war. It is fair to admit that Mr. LINCOLN has, on several occasions, displayed a degree of prudence and moderation which could scarcely have been expected from a ruler elected almost by accident. He has steadily discouraged Abolition projects, because first would have rendered reunion impossible, and he has even hesitated in approving the bill for the suppression of Slavery in Columbia, on the ground that the inhabitants of the District ought to have been previously consulted. A desire to terminate the war, even at the cost of considerable sacrifices, would be highly creditable to his good name and humanity, and not inconsistent with his character. French intervention would probably be popular in the North, if only on account of the antipathy to England, which is carefully cherished by demagogues of all persuasions. It must be remembered, however, that the fact of M. Mercier's mission is not ascertained, and it is possible that he may never even have moved from his house at Washington.

THE VIEWS OF THE PARIS PRESS.

Correspondence of the London Herald.

The Débats, the Temps and the Revue des Deux Mondes are highly indignant at the prevailing report of a joint intervention of England and France in America. The continuance of useless strife and fearful loss of life seems to these papers, whose views on the subject one would have supposed, from their general tone, to be more enlightened, preferable to any conciliatory steps taken by the great Western Powers to put an end to the calamities of civil war across the Atlantic, and at the same time relieve a large portion of their [illegible] from the [illegible] struggle. [illegible] gument is that [illegible] to return peace, [illegible] is an encouragement to Slavery [illegible] is the more curious from the fact of the "peculiar institution" having survived in the French Colonies until 1848. It is not doubted here that M. Mercier's journey to Richmond is strictly political, and has direct reference to the war, and it is far from impossible that it may lead to the recognition of the Southern States as a separate nation. I subjoin some remarks on the subject from the new number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, published this day; you will observe that the Revue adopts as beyond question all the facts given from a Federal source, although its correctness has been disproved by later intelligence. It says:

"The accounts brought by the last mails from America, although, as published by different journals, somewhat contradictory, will tend to prove the ascendency of the Northern States. Attempts have been made to draw some inductions favorable to the cause of the South; but this is wrong. The Secessionists have boldly defended the Isle No. 10. The loss of that position does not do them more honor than that of Fort Donelson. The sanguinary battle of Pittsburg, gained by the Confederates on the first day, was lost by them on the second. The Federals had a preponderance of forces on the occasion. We have reason to believe that these incidents of the war have increased great encouragement at Richmond, and that it is even in contemplation to evacuate Virginia, and remove the seat of the Federal Government to the South. This moral change given to the Government at Richmond, does not appear to be unconnected with the unexplained visit of M. MERCIER, the French Minister at Washington, to the capital of Virginia. Letters which we believe to be correct, give a similar explanation as to this visit. It has been it would appear, in accord with Lord LYONS and the American Government, that the French Minister went to military Mission of the discouragement prevailing at Richmond, and to make, in a semi-official character, an attempt at conciliation. However this may be, we think that nothing can be more unwisely than to speak as certain journals do, of the approaching recognition of the Southern Republic by France and England combined. We must admit that a speech of Mr. GLADSTONE, at Manchester, might have furnished a pretext for the fresh hopes of the fanatical or misguided enemies of the American cause. Those who go further than Mr. GLADSTONE, and who call for the recognition of the Southern States by France and England, in order to secure a supply of cotton for the manufacturers, do not hesitate to place under the invocation of a selfish interest one of the most violent acts of political injustice that has ever been conceived, but that iniquity would not attain the object for which it would be committed. Foreign intervention would render eternal the hatred between the two dismembered parts of the United States; it would lead to such acts of violence that it is probable that the cultivation of cotton in the Southern States would not long survive the manifestation of the interested sympathy which certain nations of Europe would have shown for the insurrection of the slaveowners against the American Union."

SEIZURE OF THE EMILY ST. PIERRE.

OVATION TO CAPT. WILSON.

HIS STATEMENT.

On the 3d inst., the rooms of the Liverpool Mercantile Marine Association were crowded almost to suffocation by the merchants and mercantile marine officers of Liverpool, to witness the presentation of a magnificent testimonial to Capt. WILLIAM WILSON, of the British ship Emily St. Pierre, for his pluck and gallantry in recapturing his ship, which had been seized by the United States cruiser, James Adger, off Charleston. The occasion was also availed of to present the cook and steward of the ship with a substantial acknowledgment of their bravery, in assisting Capt. WILSON in his deed of daring.

The presentation was of a most costly and handsome description. It consisted of a magnificent gold pocket chronometer, a complete tea and coffee service in silver, a dozen silver teaspoons, with the accompanying adjuncts of a pair of sugar tongs, caddy spoon, sugar spoon and coffee tray. The coffee service, particularly, was of the most chaste and elaborate design, and every article partook of that elegance of form which bespeaks the hand of the master. The unexceptionable nature of the workmanship was such as might have been expected from the well known establishment of Mr. MAYNE, of Lord-street. The massive salver, round the rim of which was a graceful wreath of the ears of wheat, was in every respect "a thing of beauty." On the centre of the salver was engraved the following inscription: "Presented, with a silver coffee and tea service, and gold pocket chronometer, to Capt. WILLIAM WILSON, by 170 merchants of Liverpool, in token of their admiration of his daring gallantry in recapturing his ship Emily St. Pierre, of Liverpool, on the 21st March, 1862, with the assistance of his cook and steward only, from a prize crew, consisting of two officers and thirteen men of the United States navy—May 3, 1862."

After the Chairman had made the presentation, with suitable eulogistic remarks,

Capt. WILSON, who was received with loud cheers, said: Gentlemen—I may be forgiven if, in reply, I read the following, as I feel I could not trust myself to give the facts of the case in any other way: "I left Calcutta on the 27th November, with orders to make the Coast of South Carolina, to ascertain whether it was peace or war; if peace, I was to take a pilot and enter the port of Charleston; if blockaded, I was to proceed to St. John, N. B. On the 18th March, 1862, I considered myself about 12 miles off the land, when I saw a steamer coming towards me, which proved to be the war vessel James Adger. I hauled up my courses, and backed the mainyard, and was soon boarded by two boats, whose officers and crew took possession of the ship, and filling the mainyard, they steered for the fleet, and brought the ship to anchor about 3½ o'clock. I was then ordered into the boat (the officer taking all my papers with him,) and taken on board the steamer Florida where I remained till about 4½ o'clock without any one speaking to me. I was afterwards told by the officer, BOUDERSSOUN that I had saltpetre on board, that I was a lawful prize to the Federal Government, that I could take a passage in the ship to Philadelphia and allow the officers the use of my instruments and charts. I replied that they should have the use of them, but that my cargo was not saltpetre, and that my ship was British property. I returned to my ship in an hour, found my crew all taken away, except the cook and steward, and a new company on board, consisting of Lieut. BROWN, Master's-Mate, twelve men, and a passenger—fifteen in all. We weighed anchor and proceeded to sea. On the morning of the 21st March (being Lieut. BROWN's watch on deck), I called the cook and steward into my state-room, about 4½ o'clock, and said to them that I had made up my mind to lose my life or have my ship, and asked their assistance, which was obtained. [Applause.] I then gave a pair of irons and a sheet to them, and told them to follow me. The Master's-Mate was asleep in his berth, and after handing out his revolver and sword, I grasped his hands. The irons were fixed and the gag was in its place in a minute. [Cheers.] I then went to the passenger, (an engineer), and having taken the arms from his berth, I secured him in the same way. [Cheers.] I then went on deck, as if I had just turned out, and walked the deck for about ten minutes alongside BROWN, remarking the fair wind, &c., and soon after I asked him to go to the cabin to look at the chart, and saying that the coffee would be down directly. He started from the poop, and I followed, laying hold of an iron belaying pin on my way down. I entered the fore cabin just as he was at the door of the after cabin where the chart was spread out ready. I brought him up by saying BROWN! and holding the belaying pin over his head, I told him that my ship should never go to Philadelphia. [Cheers.] The cook and steward were both ready, and before he could utter a sound the irons were on his wrists, the gag in his mouth, and he pitched into a berth. [Cheers.] I locked him up, and having secured my cabin intruders, went on deck. Three men were walking the deck, one was at the helm and one on the lookout. I called the three men aft, and pointing to the hatchway of the storeroom near the helm, said that a coil of rope was wanted up. I shoved off the hatch, and pointing to a corner where it was, they all three jumped down. I immediately closed the hatch, and warned the man at the helm of his danger if he moved or spoke. The lookout was then called aft, and when asked whether he would help to work the ship to a British port, he said no. I therefore put him with the others, guarding the hatchway. I then called the watch, and as sailors do not come on deck all together, we got two aft and secured before any suspicion was aroused; the third man of the watch below drew his knife at the steward, upon which he fired, and the shot went through his shoulder; the others were soon secured, and in the space of a morning's watch I was again in charge of my ship. [Cheers.] I soon came down and announced the pleasing fact to Lieut. BROWN. I told him I would take the gag out of his mouth and the irons off his wrists if he contented himself to remain a prisoner in his berth. He was at liberty to take a passage to England. I promised him good treatment and food, when the steward could prepare any. He dined at the cabin table under guard, and was then replaced in his berth. The crew were supplied daily with bread, beef, and water, and buckets were provided to answer nature's requirements. After consideration, four robust seamen of lead a hand rather than be in confinement, but these were landsmen, and only one could steer, and that imperfectly. This, then, gentlemen, was my position; I was 2,000 miles away from my native land, without a helmsman in all my crew, but myself, for while some books and stewards can steer mine could not. I experienced a heavy gale of wind, and feared that after all I should not make my passage, for my tiller was broken during the storm, and I was nearly twelve hours fitting a temporary one. You may easily judge my difficulties when you consider a thirty days' passage in such circumstances; with such a crew and such a number of prisoners. [Hear, hear, hear.] When I wanted to reef the topsails I had to take the reef tackles to the capstan, and then lay aloft to pass the earings and tie the points alone, at the same time keeping my eye upon the ship's head, and waving to my faithful cook and steward how to move the helm. [Great cheering.] I arrived in the Mersey after a passage of thirty days from the recapture. And I desire, in this public manner, and on this pleasing occasion, to offer my thanks to Almighty God for his great and marvelous help in all my trying circumstances. [Cheers.] My thanks are also due to my faithful cook and steward, who, this day, receive a reward for their brave services at your hands. [Loud cheering.] For myself, I have much I can only say that I did my duty in trying to recapture my ship against numerous odds, and you are here to day to rejoice over my success. [Applause.] It is unnecessary for me to proceed, but we are permitted to be thankful. For the handsome token of your kindness I thank you, and I pray that your generous deed will be a spur to the British sailor who, in the hour of trial and heavy responsibility may be encouraged that their efforts for the right and true will not be lost sight of nor go unrewarded by the first maritime nation in the world. [Loud and repeated cheering.]

England and Mexican Intervention.

From the London Times.

Our own Government has gradually withdrawn even its originally small stake in the military part of the enterprise, and we have new little beyond a moral interpretation in the matter. We shall get such redress for the past, and guarantees for the future, as are found to be tolerable, and we want nothing more. We have, indeed, been unalterably convinced of the necessity of some reorganization of the Mexican State, and if it should be argued that a republic has been found so impossible with such people, we could not contradict the conclusion. Beyond these general views of the case, however, we do not proceed, but the policy of France is doubtless more definite, as is the policy of Spain. Moreover, besides these States, the Federal States of America have a strong interest in the impending results, and the Government of Washington would not be ill-pleased to see the designs of France and Spain prove abortive together. It is said that the American Minister at Mexico has given his aid and countenance to the faction in power, and that he has offered, on behalf of his Government, to lend the Mexicans money for the discharge of their obligations, and troops for the support of their army. The Federals, in fact, object strongly both to the intervention of the Allies and to its presumed object. They pretend to a monopoly of American politics and American soil; they quote their own "Monroe doctrine" against the appearance of Europeans on their continent; and, above all, they are indignant at the substitution of a monarchy for a republic, which the Allies are supposed to be contemplating. The spectacle of a Democracy convicted of failure, with the abatement of the nuisance by European arms in favor of a more practicable form of Government, is terribly offensive to American eyes, and the Federals would, doubtless, have interposed after their own fashion, but for the ample occupation with which they are already provided.

For ourselves, as we in this country have no concern with the "Monroe doctrine," and as we desire only that Mexico should be organized under some Government competent to assure the ends for which all Governments are established, we can only rejoice that the intervention is about to become a reality. If France can act with fewer prejudices and with better purposes than Spain, by all means let her take the lead. Had she done so at first perhaps the whole affair might by this time have been finished, and the mishaps of the expedition have been escaped. We shall probably not participate in the sanguine visions of our neighbors respecting the "throne of Montezuma," but of one thing we feel perfectly assured, and that is, that whatever Government is substituted in Mexico, the prompt anarchy of the State cannot fail to be a gain both to the people of the country and to all the commercial nations of the world.

Further Explanations from Mr. Russell.

To the Editor of the London Times:

SIR: In the letter of your correspondent from New-York, which appeared in the Times of April 30, it is said: "Much regret and disappointment are everywhere expressed that the special war correspondent of the Times did not apply to the Capitals of the Rebels for the hospitalities so churlishly denied him by the War-office at Washington." That remark renders it necessary for me to state that, some time previous to the order of Mr. STANTON, prohibiting my acceptance of Gen. MCCLELLAN's invitation, I went to Baltimore, in company with Col. HOWARD, of the Royal Artillery, in order to go down to Fort Monroe, and visit Capt. HAWES, of the Rinaldo, with whom we were both acquainted, by the United States Government steamer, which is the only regular mode of transit. On applying at the office of Gen. DIX for the usual papers or permits, we were informed that orders had been received from the War Department not to issue such documents to any persons, except those in the service of the United States Government, without special directions from the Secretary of War. To requests for permission to visit Her Majesty's ship Rinaldo, made by telegraph, by letter, and by personal application at Washington, Mr. STANTON vouchsafed no reply. We had resolved on chartering a small schooner, and sailing from Baltimore down the Chesapeake, but gave up the idea on being informed the vessel would not be permitted to pass Fort M'Henry. Mr. STANTON commenced his discourtesy by refusing to a British officer of distinction the ordinary civility of a passage on board a passenger steamer to visit a British man-of-war, which he carried out by prohibiting an American officer, late Commander-in-Chief of the United States armies, from extending the hospitality of his camp and quarters to a friend. Some gentlemen of Southern proclivities in Baltimore offered to place us on board the Rinaldo without the smallest difficulty, but we considered it would not be proper to avail ourselves of such an offer, notwithstanding the part taken by the authority at Washington might be supposed to solve any obligations to respect it, except those imposed by our consciences and feelings of honor. Capt. HAWES wrote and offered us the hospitalities of his ship, when he heard we were coming on a short visit, but Mr. STANTON was determined not to let us go, and he would, no doubt, order away the Rinaldo if he dared. In conclusion, I may be permitted to add, I have received assurances that Gen. McClellan has expressed himself strongly in reference to Mr. Stanton's conduct to himself and to not in the matter, and that he and all his Staff have been kind enough to declare to my friends how deeply they regret my absence from their camp.

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,
YOUR LATE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT IN AMERICA.

A FRENCH VIEW OF THE DISMISSAL OF MR. RUSSELL.

Correspondence of the London Times.

PARIS, Monday, April 27, 1862.

The refusal of the President of the United States, or of his Secretary of War, to allow your correspondent to be present at the headquarters of the Federal army under Gen. MCCLELLAN reminds me very forcibly of the conduct of the Emperor NAPOLEON in similar circumstances. In the beginning of the war in Italy an application was made in Paris to the then Minister of the Interior, the Duke of Padua, through M. DE LAVERNOIS, then Director of the Press, for permission for a representative of the Times to be present with the French army, in order to report its operations in the field. M. LAVERNOIS promptly laid the request before the Minister, and the Minister, though it did not properly belong to his functions, forwarded as promptly the application to the Emperor's headquarters in Italy. His Majesty lost no time in replying, and the reply was that the correspondent of the Times was at perfect liberty to accompany the army, and that all he expected was, not that he himself or the army should be praised, but that the account of the operations should be impartial. Now, when we remember the views entertained in England about that war, its probable object, and its ulterior consequences, not to speak of the adverse opinions so strongly expressed on the part of the Imperial Government, relating to its domestic and foreign policy, it must be admitted that the answer of the Emperor was greatly to his credit; and I am happy to have an opportunity of contrasting the conduct of the President of the "free and enlightened Republic" with the ruler of a Military Empire, who led his own armies in the field.

The Intentions of the South in Regard to the Cotton Crop.

From the Manchester Guardian.

The following extract from a private letter from New-Orleans, received by an eminent commercial house in this city, has been kindly handed to us for publication. It is dated 27th of March, and the writer is a British subject, holding an influential position in New-Orleans:

"The worst thing that could happen to her (England) would be to allow the North to get hold of the cotton ports; in which case, it becomes as near a certainty as possible that she will get no cotton until she retakes them. The Southern Congress has passed a bill, almost unanimously, to destroy all cotton that may be in danger of falling into the enemy's hands. The bill also contains a clause promising indemnity to the owners. This policy will be sternly carried out; and we doubt whether even cotton bought by foreign houses will be spared, and that must involve enormous losses, as the business has been done to a large extent. The course England has followed so far, however just and impartial it may have been, does not appear to have had the effect of conciliating the North, but rather the contrary; while, if followed much longer, it will certainly give rise to a very unfriendly feeling toward her on the part of the South. At present, the game is in her own hands, as, by a prompt recognition of the South, she can get free trade, and any other terms she pleases. But delays are dangerous; and while gaining nothing by vainly trying to avoid giving offence to the North, whose trade, under a Morrill or other protectionist tariff, can never be of any vital value to her, she may lose the chance of opening up a most lucrative direct trade with the South, which, in a short time, would greatly exceed in value all she has ever done with the whole of the old United States. So far as the debts and losses of the South, caused by this war, have yet gone, we see no reason to doubt her perfect solvency, and willingness to stand up to them, as well as her ability to become a larger consumer than ever of foreign manufactures, the imports of which would be readily met by the exports of her unrivaled agricultural wealth, including cotton, tobacco, &c. As yet, her powers of producing these have not been impaired to any considerable extent. [illegible] attention to the [illegible] proceeds of life; and the [illegible] being withdrawn, it appears certain, from all the international and even national, that the planting of the staple will be exceedingly curtailed this year. The result, then, that England refrains from recognizing the South, the worse it will be for her manufacturing interests; and the North will some day reap the benefits of a commerce which England might make her own, by a simple act of justice in recognizing a fixed fact, for the Southern Confederacy is one. What we wish to impress strongly upon you, is the certainty of the total destruction of the cotton on hand, as well as the future cotton-producing power of the South, in event of the North being able to take possession of the Southern ports, and to commence overrunning the cotton regions. In that case, you can estimate better than we can what England would suffer; whilst this country would be thrown incalculably back in her progress, and would be of little value to the world at large for years to come.

The recent success to the Southern arms have done more than anything else that could have happened to render final success on the part of the North impossible. The people are now fully aware of the magnitude and deadly nature of the struggle at hand, and, so far from desponding, there has been such a rally to reinforce the Generals in the field, that we venture to say many weeks will not pass ere striking proof is given of the strength and ability of the South to continue the war to the bitter end. We give you these views for what they are worth, hoping that, at all events, they will interest you as the reflection of the current opinions here among those who really think on the subject, and who can not be accused of being swayed by popular clamors, or by the violent and frequently foolish writings in our public Press.

CHRONICLE OF THE REBELLION.

AFFAIRS IN THE SOUTH.

AN INSIDE VIEW OF THE REBELLION.

The Burlington (Vt.) Free Press has recently published an interesting and valuable series of sketches of the state of affairs in the South, written by a gentleman who managed to work his way through the rebel lines. He passed through New-Orleans about March, in company with an Episcopal minister, also a native of New-England, who was determined to return home. By assuming the character of a violent Secessionist, he managed to see a great deal. He writes:

I had never seen New-Orleans as it was then. Usually steamboats, ships, and steamships line both banks of the river, and the levee is crowded with produce, and presents a scene of constant bustle and business. Now, the levee was entirely bare and deserted, and not a vessel or boat of any kind was visible, except one little ferry-boat for passengers. I do not believe the reports lately published about the large number of gunboats built by the rebels at New-Orleans. They were building two at Memphis; but I could not find out that any were being constructed at New-Orleans. I saw the whole of Algiers, (opposite New-Orleans,) where usually boats are built or repaired, and certainly there was no work in progress there. Perhaps they have armed and partially ironplated old river boats; but they cannot be of much account as war-vessels. Their vessels built last Spring and Summer, though small, are said to be good.

In proportion to the population, there are, I think, more Union men in New-Orleans than in any place I have visited; except Austin, the Capital of Texas. I have talked with a great many Union men there; there was no one of them who did not say that the majority of the people were for the Union. Some said two-thirds were Union men, some three-fourths, but all said a majority. A very intelligent and wealthy man, a native of that State, said that the Government would have no trouble from the inhabitants of Louisiana, provided the people were convinced that the slaves were not to be set free! I said to a banker, of whom I was purchasing gold, that "the premium for gold was becoming pretty high." "Well," said he, "a big Southern victory would bring it down somewhat, but it would soon commence rising again. In fact, the only question about this matter is whether it is a case of consumption or apoplexy!" and then the old fellow laughed as if he enjoyed telling the truth, if it was dangerous. I met an acquaintance, a prominent Secessionist, just returned from Memphis. "I suppose," said I, "all our boys are turning out in great numbers from Memphis to join out the Yankees?" "Yes, a good many have gone." "There are no Union men there, I hope?" "Yes, there are," said he, "a G—n fight of 'em, and they just mean to stay there and raise the Lincoln flag when the Yankee troops come; but, ——— 'em, they are marked, every one of 'em, and when the war's finished and we've got independence, they'll hitch hell, now cure." Perhaps you can guess what it is in the sunny South to "hitch hell." Secession talk is always profusely interlarded with profane expletives. Ordinary adverbs have gone out of use. One gentleman told me that at least five thousand men in New-Orleans would assist the United States troops as soon as an opportunity was presented. We shall know before long whether this is true. The letter of surrender of the Mayor of New-Orleans to Commodore FARRAGUT, just published, is the richest thing I have seen. It is written entirely for effect outside the city,—but what a magnificent liar he is!

After a stay of four days in the city, a friend procured me a pass. Just after the cars started, officers in uniform passed through the train and examined and marked all the passes.

The whole State of Mississippi was roused. BRAGGSAND had called for ninety-day volunteers, and what men were left in Mississippi seemed all to be leaving for the seat of war. The long train of cars was full of soldiers, and at every village more cars were added and more troops came aboard. The invader must be repelled, and the defeat at Donelson avenged. At first, men were shy of talking to a big Yankee. Now it is different, for it was known at last that the Yankees were dangerous customers to deal with, and sometimes could not be induced to run. As we stopped at a village, it was sad indeed to see the whole population at the depôt, all in tears—mothers, wives and daughters—crying, as they took leave, perhaps forever, of their brave sons, husbands and fathers, many of whom were in tears also, but who were determined, at any sacrifice, to defend their homes, firesides, and the sacred soil of the lovely State that gave them birth, from the ruthless invader. Fine looking men they were, generally of the better class, and fired with patriotic ardor—but how deluded!

The Mississippi troops are the best I have seen in the rebel service. They have better men, more intelligent and more gentlemanly than any others I have happened to meet. Of course some Mississippi regiments are exceptions, probably, but if so, I have not seen the exceptions.

The new levies to the Southern army are all poorly armed—generally with double (sometimes single) barrel shot-guns, useless except at the closest range, and home-made, heavy, useless bowie-knives. Second-hand navy-revolvers brought $100 apiece and more, in New-Orleans, and were hard to get at any price. I don't believe more than half that story lately published about the great arrival of Enfield rifles for BRAGGSAND's army. They received some, probably, but if all Southern accounts of the arrival of ship-loads of arms were true, every man, woman and child in the South would have an Enfield rifle. On the line of the railroad between Memphis and Chattanooga, were thirty or forty thousand men. This is the army which, together with reinforcements since received, fought the battle of Pittsburgh Landing. They were well armed, except the new levies, but a dirtier and more miserable set of men I never saw.

Corinth, through which we passed, was not then fortified at all, nor had many troops begun to concentrate there.

From their conversation on the cars, I judged that the troops would not be so formidable again as they have been. There was no more braggadocio talk about whipping five to one, &c. They talked a good deal about running, how far they could run in a day, &c., if it should unfortunately happen to be necessary for them to get out of the way. "I mean to kill one d——d Yankee anyhow," said a fellow. "But," said another, "what if a big Kentucky Union man gets hold of you?" There was no reply, but only solemn stillness. Evidently the "big Kentucky-Union-man" aspect of the case was not very inspiriting. Southern soldiers are easily elated and easily depressed, and every recent BRAGGSAND makes has an effect upon the Southern volunteers almost as disastrous as a defeat. The battle at Pittsburgh Landing restored their confidence, for I know that it was represented in the whole South to be a great victory. Nobody there ever finds out the truth about a battle—not even the soldiers themselves in many cases.

A few thousand troops were sent down from Richmond to reinforce A. S. JOHNSTON, and these troops arrived about the time we passed through.

All the way through East Tennessee, a sentry bridge on the railroad line, troops were stationed—from two to eight companies at each bridge. This was for fear of another bridge-burning by Union men, though Southern papers had told us that the rebellion (against rebel authority) had broken down in East Tennessee. About this time [illegible] Knoxville, we met a company of men just from there who had been taken prisoners. They were called out, and refusing to obey, two companies of militia were collected, by squadrons armed men, and marched them into a warehouse, where they were locked up and kept two or three days and nights, and then sent out to camp. One man who refused to go was shot dead in the street. They had not been in camp long when it was known that almost all these men had managed to desert.

We arrived at Richmond seven days after leaving Missouri. It used to be a journey of eighty-four hours. It seemed as if we had taken down Richmond is the only place in the South whose prosperity has been increased by the war. It is a beautiful place, and was crowded with military men and visitors. Martial law had been established, and every day many persons suspected of disloyalty to the Confederate States were arrested. People were not in good spirits. The fall of Donelson had cast a gloom over the whole South. Yet I was told by members of the Confederate Congress that the North did not call it a victory—that the newspapers, and President LINCOLN himself, said one more such victory would ruin the United States Government, and that the rebel loss in killed and wounded was far greater than the Confederate loss in killed, wounded and prisoners.

News of the battle of Pea Ridge came while I was there. At first it was a great victory, as they said. "We (Confederates) have forty thousand men, and they have the same number, but though they are best armed, our men fight like devils, and will probably capture the whole force." Finally, Jeff. DAVIS said it was a drawn battle, and everybody else said the same thing. The fight between the Monitor and Merrimac came off at this time, and telegrams arrived every hour. The Merrimac drove off the Monitor, they said, and was herself unhurt, except a few balls were destroyed, and the iron prow somewhat damaged, after destroying three or four fine frigates and killing fifteen hundred of the Yankees. They said they were going to take Fortress Monroe, just to show the Yankees what they could do, and then blow up the miserable place and leave the peninsula. If hard pushed, they would break up their large armies and every man become a guerrilla—gorilla, as spelled by some Southern papers.

I did not see the Immortal JEFFERSON DAVIS—the Gods give accord Washington. He was occupied every day in the Cabinet meetings, and was invisible to vulgar eyes. I had the honor, however, of beholding Mrs. DAVIS, the handsome lady, apparently not more than 25 or 28 years old, with a pleasant countenance, and of pleasing and intelligent countenance. Evidently JEFF. DAVIS has good in some respects, if not in politics.

During a stay in Richmond of four days, I was in the rebel Congress every day. Both Houses assembled about 10 o'clock A. M., with open doors, and the dear people were allowed to come in and see and hear everything that was going on. They could not learn much however, for nothing important was done during open session. About 1 o'clock every day all spectators were turned out, and then commenced the secret session. All business of consequence was transacted then, and of course, no outsiders ever found out anything about it. The Confederate Congress seemed to me a "one-horse" affair. Perhaps their best men are not Congressmen, but it seems to me that the Vermont Legislature is generally a body equally able and more respectable.

I called on the Secretary of War, Mr. BENJAMIN, who looks exactly like what he is—a Jew—showed him my letters, and asked for a pass to go North. "If you had come here," said he, "three weeks ago, I would have given you a pass, but now I cannot do it. The United States have acted with great perfidy in reference to the exchange of prisoners. I have not granted passes to any one for three weeks, and shall give no more passes during the war to persons wishing to go North." But" said I, "the action of the United States has nothing to do with this matter. In granting a pass now, you are only doing a favor to a loyal citizen of the Confederate States, and you see from these letters that you can have no objection to my going." On his refusing again, I told him I was going anyway. "Well," said he, "you can try it at your own risk, but you will certainly be arrested. If you get by our lines, the first Federal troops you meet will seize and put you in prison. They put everybody in prison who reaches them from the South." So the conference ended.

On the grounds around the Capitol, I saw companies of militia, who had been forced into service by Letcher, Governor of the State. They were all men of the better class, merchants, lawyers, and others—all well dressed and intelligent men in appearance, but they now looked melancholy enough. Undoubtedly many or most of them were Union men, but there was no possible way to avoid the service. Very few of them had shot-guns, most no arms at all. The first day after my arrival, I was in a room occupied by United States prisoners—officers on parole, who had been ordered to Richmond to be exchanged. While there, Confederate officers entered the room, arrested the paroled prisoners, and took them off to prison. They looked at me pretty hard, and I got out of the room as soon as possible. When I went to the Provost Marshal's office to get a pass to leave the city, there was present one of the officers who had made the arrest, who immediately had a whispered conversation with others higher in authority. The result was that I had the pleasure of giving Gen. WINDER a minute history of the whole life of myself and of some of my friends, with an account of present circumstances, pecuniary and social—of family relations, &c. The result of a half hour's conversation was, that he refused me a pass to return home, via New-Orleans, which was all I had asked from him. Things looked gloomy, but after a hard day's work, I at last secured a pass to leave the city. I was obliged to obtain a written statement from a member of Congress of my acquaintance, vouching for me as a loyal citizen and good secessionist, which statement was put on file. My pass was taken away in the cars, but was nearly as follows:

RICHMOND, March ——, 1862.

"The bearer, Mr. ———, has permission to visit New-Orleans, upon his honor not to give any information, which, if published, might prove injurious to the interests of the Government of the Confederate States.

Gen. ——— WINDER, Provost Marshal.

P. S.—Subject to the discretion of the "Military Authorities."

The clause, "upon his honor," &c., of course had no force, for I made no promises. This pass differed from those given to others; they had no postscript as mine had, and nobody was deprived of his pass by the officers in the cars except myself. My traveling companion had no better success than myself, in trying to obtain permission to come North. We selected on the map a point on the railroad in East Tennessee which seemed convenient to the Cumberland mountains and determined [illegible] to the enemy, and they were kept over.

GUERRILLA WARFARE.

The Richmond papers publish large numbers of advertisements urging enlistment in companies of "Southern Rangers." J. D. Imboden, who proposes to be Colonel of one of these regiments for service west of the Blue Ridge, says in his appeal:

"The corps will consist of ten companies of a select character, immediate and dear, I subject to the partizan region of country in which it is to operate. The officers, except myself, will all be elected as in other arms of the service. The staff to be appointed. The enlistment will be for the war, and any one may join me who is not now regularly mustered into the military service of the country. The pay, rations, etc., are the same as in the army, with the additional advantage that the Government will pay the full value of all arms and munitions captured from the enemy.

"Judging from the applications I have already received, the corps will be speedily filled up; but as I desire to have only a select band, I call upon my friends in this public manner. The fact that a number of officers of high military distinction in the late service, and of the army, have already expressed a desire to join me in this wild, adventurous service, is the best and purest of all my qualifications to the confidence of the country, have already expressed a desire to join me in this wild, adventurous service, and the more mechanical of great number of men, induces me to express the hope that many others will do likewise.

"I don't propose to rely much on military science, but [illegible] rough fighting and backwoods fighting, to make the country ring with the prowess of a Partizan Ranger. I shall [illegible] to be a Partizan with a double-barrelled shot-gun, and [illegible] the gratification simply [illegible] and the arms captured of such other gun. My headquarters will be not [illegible] during the organization. As fast as companies of sixty or sixty-two men are organized, they will be [illegible] to the field. I desire all who can, to bring the best arms they have—shot-guns, rifles, pistols, &c. We will try and get better ones hereafter. Also, one good suit of clothes, with a change of under-clothing, and one good blanket. Mounted men will furnish their own horses on the same terms as cavalry."

[illegible] Sears, "of Pamunkey, Captain, C. S. A." says: "I have received the requisite authority to enlist a corps of Partizan Rangers to serve during the war.

"The corps is designed to consist of mounted riflemen, cavalry and infantry, and have attached to it a battery of light artillery. I propose to operate within the enemy's lines, and will be enabled to hold out the prospect of a more active life than that which falls to the lot of the regular soldier; at all events, the members of the corps will not be subject to the tedium of camp life.

"I carefully and most earnestly invite all who desire to enter the partizan branch of the service to unite with me, and all companies and battalions not mustered into the Confederate service. I desire gentlemen who propose to unite with me to bring with them each private arms as they may be able to command—rifles, guns, pistols, &c.

"The corps is hunting for its scalp, and our Commissary has orders to pay for all arms and munitions of war which we may capture from the enemy, thus placing the resources of our country and the oppressors of our country upon the footing of the savage beast of the forest, to be captured or slain at all times and by any means not prohibited by legal warfare.

"I invoke all companies men to join me who are not engaged in the military service, and especially I invite them to join me whether animated by the simple love of country, or a hatred of the public enemy; whether they have a wrong to redress, a tenement to clear or a home to protect."

PLANS OF OUR ENEMIES.

From the Memphis Avalanche, April 6.

The statement of M. Mercier, the French Minister, on his return from Richmond, that he was astonished to find that our Government, in the face of all our recent disasters, was still buoyant and hopeful, is not, under the circumstances, at all surprising. He and the Government he represents have been misled by the crafty policy of the Lincoln Government. The European Governments, in the European Times, on proposing to intervene in behalf of peace, in the beginning of the present struggle, were informed by Seward that owing to the delay in procuring arms, they had been unable to make the progress they had anticipated, crushing out the rebellion, but that if they would only allow him ninety days from the first of March, he would agree, if the rebellion was not then at an end, that the United States should intervene for peace. Hence the activity in the Northern army, and the bustle in the Northern arsenals. Great efforts are to be made in the intervening time to overrun as many of the Southern States as possible. Our enemies can hardly expect to conquer or subdue our people. They must know that that is impossible. But what they have took it to get as large a share of our territory as possible, in order that when the foreign powers do intervene, as they seem confidently to expect, they may put the blade there of the States. It is for this reason that we have been so much pained to observe the evacuating policy which has been pursued so generally. The enemy already hold Maryland, Kentucky and Missouri, with large portions of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Florida. This would give them a decided advantage in the negotiation for a boundary. It is [illegible] that our Congress has already declared that the war shall last until every foot of Southern soil is redeemed from the occupancy of the Northern armies, but it is also true that we have lost territory, but, on the contrary, have lost none. [illegible] *The prospect of our recovering lost ground, then, is not so bright as we could wish. It is said that if the enemy fail in battle at Corinth, that we shall first take and then capture his army; and, these advantages attained, we shall adopt an aggressive policy, and carry the war into the enemy's own country. It would have been well far us if we had adopted this course long since. Our armies, instead of pending inactive lives in camp, would have been greatly delighted at the opportunity of glory on such a raid. Still it may not be too late to adopt this policy now. It is, in our opinion, the only way to put an end to the war. As long as the Federals can sit quietly at home and escape the evils of the war they inflict upon others, there is but little probability of their agreeing to any proposition for peace which does not involve our own humiliation. But war in their own doors—an invasion of their own homes and homes—could not fail to have a beneficial influence upon their minds toward a speedy peace. We believe also that "cotton is king" has exploded, after inflicting upon us all the ills under which we suffer. It seems to us to be the highest dictate of wisdom, in our opinion, now to adopt an aggressive warfare. We have tried the defensive policy, and it has resulted in materially damaging us. Let us now try the aggressive. Let us try it, too, at once. What more is done, should be done speedily, for there is now but two months in which to turn the tide in our favor, and strike a balance-sheet with the North, before Europe intervenes."

THE WAR IN VIRGINIA.

From the Memphis Argus, May 6.

The telegraph announces the withdrawal into the interior, from Yorktown, of the Confederate army, and also the escort of Federal gunboats to West Point, on York River, 20 miles below its formation by the junction of the Pamunkey and Mattapony. The only direction by which our army could reach the interior was up the Peninsula, between the York and James Rivers, through Charles City and New Kent Counties.

The general impression that the withdrawal of our forces into the interior has been occasioned by the appearance of Federal gunboats at West Point, (which, by the way, is over one hundred miles from Richmond,) is incorrect. McClellan, no doubt, having discovered the route to Richmond, via Yorktown and the Peninsula, to be a "hard road to travel," is preparing for a sudden movement on the capital via Fredericksburgh, occupied, some time since, by Gen. Banks' column.

The timely information of this design has reached Gen. Johnston in authentic shape, and thus his sudden movement up the Peninsula to cover Richmond upon that side, will, we think, be found correct. His command of the Peninsula doubtless has to throw his army suddenly in other direction, and thus protect Richmond by a movement via Yorktown or Fredericksburgh. We can easily believe that the movement is approved in Richmond. Who ever heard of Gen. Johnston making a bad move? Let no one feel alarmed for the safety of Richmond.

The Avalanche remarks: "We learn from an officer lately from Virginia, that the evacuation of Yorktown—to which the dispatch from Richmond in yesterday's issue referred—was not a complete evacuation, but only that our troops had fallen back some five miles, to other intrenchments just as good as those they left behind. So, we may expect yet to hear of a great battle at or near Yorktown, before Richmond bows to Federal domination."

The same paper publishes this dispatch:

"Richmond, May 4.—Our forces retired from Yorktown. The movement is generally approved here. Yesterday three of the enemy's gunboats ascended York River to West Point, about 15 miles from Richmond. One gunboat fired at the last train which left West Point.

THE SURRENDER OF NEW-ORLEANS.

Correspondence Richmond Dispatch.

MEMPHIS, April 28, 1862.

At New-Orleans, another scene was enacted in the great drama, for which modern history has few parallels. Men, women, and children, turned out of their houses en masse, to aid in the destruction of the property liable to capture. Gentlemen were seen rolling kegs of sugar into the levées, until they numbered thousands; casks of molasses were knocked in end, and the contents meandered sweetly through the gutters, in streams ankle deep. The torch was applied to King Cotton, and when night came, there fledged up against the dark sky volumes of fire from 20 cotton presses, mingling in the conflagration the spoils of industry, exertion, speculation, and avarice, which otherwise would have graced the coffers of the Lincolnites. Citizens gathered in silent knots upon the housetops, and amid the gentle twittings, to their wives, mute expressions of determination never to surrender; the ladies and children mustered in crowds upon the thoroughfares, waving Confederate flags and eliciting the cheers of the populace, while the more excitable, in the exuberant fulness of the lower classes, could hardly be prevented from laying violent hands upon the minions of Lincolndom who were landed to do the Federal bidding. The Stars and Stripes were cut down and trampled in the dust almost as soon as they floated in the air, and our own Confederate ensign run defiantly up from a hundred masthead. It was a reduction of the old time-honored fervid scenes of the Revolution, and the praises that beat in unison to a sentiment that brought strong hearts to beat in unison, to a sentiment that breathed for "liberty or death." Thus ended the sixth day of siege at our last services.

YANKEE PRISONERS.

From the Richmond Dispatch, May 9.

About 210 of the 600 odd Yankees said to have been captured by our troops in the fight near Williamsburgh on Monday, arrived here last evening under a guard of cavalry, commanded by Capt. R. A. Carter, and were lodged in the C. S. Military Prison. The prisoners marched in the centre of a hollow square, and, as a sign of the accumulation of dust did not have a very presentable look. When coming up Main-street they were allowed to buy such articles of provisions as they stood in need of. Bread was at ten cents an article that showed the parties appreciated it. We believe no one jeered at them while passing to the prison. Their bearing evinced that adversity seemed disposed to treat them with silent contempt. They represented themselves to have been kindly treated on the way. The following is a list of the officers brought here as prisoners, viz.: Lewis Benedict, Jr., Lieut.-Col., 72d N. Y.; H. R. Lee, Capt. Co. I, 94th N. Y.; Martin Willis, Co. E, 94th N. Y.; Benj. Price, Capt. Co. D, 70th N. Y.; Alex. H. Drake, Capt. Co. H, 32d N. Y.; B. S. Chamberlayne, 1st Lieut., Q. M. 5th Ill.; W. H. Sisley, 2d Lieut. Co. B, 6th New-Jersey.

Four members of Company M, 6th United States Cavalry, captured at Williamsburgh on Sunday, May 4th, by a detachment of our forces, were brought here on Wednesday evening, on the steamer Sallie. They gave the names of James Kirkpatrick, Jos. C. Quinn, Jas. Murray and R. A. Hubbard. A Yankee named Hubbard, a lieutenant of the 5th New York Regiment, captured at Harrisonburgh, was also brought down on the Central cars yesterday evening and lodged in the C. S. Military Prison.

COMPLIMENTARY.

From the Richmond Dispatch.

Among the prisoners captured in the battle of Manassas, July 21, 1861, were a batch of Yankee Surgeons, who were paroled and permitted to prowl around Richmond. Of them particularly conspicuous were Drs. J. M. Horrocks and W. F. Swalm, of the Fourteenth Brooklyn Regiment, whose loud and bitter denunciations of the "Lincoln-Seward" Administration were only equaled by their extravagant laudations of our Government. So "fascinated with our people," and so well were they "assured of the justness of our cause," that they avowed an intention, as soon as they could settle up their affairs at home, to return to "Dixie's Land," and unite their fortunes with the "sunny South." Upon a basis of these protestations, (or some other influence,) a few of our citizens were induced to take these gentry under their especial care, entertaining them at their houses, introducing them into society, driving them around the city, and otherwise catering to their pleasure. Dr. Horrocks professed entire disgust for the "imbecile policy of Abraham," and declared the only reason why he came to be in the service was, that in time of peace he had held the position of regimental surgeon, and when the clarion of war was sounded he could not resign without having been impatiens cast upon his "pluck" (bless the mark!); but, as he had passed the ordeal of Manassas' bloody field, he should resign, and, immediately upon returning home, would pour forth through the columns of the Brooklyn Eagle his vials of wrath upon the heads of the "powers that be" there, from copious notes which he had prepared and frequently exhibited.

Now let us shift the scene to New-York, and see how these patriotic and ever-sensitive gentlemen kept their plighted vows of eternal fidelity to the South. The Philadelphia Inquirer, of May 2, contains their testimony before the "Committee on the Conduct of the War," which abounds in extravagant stories and malicious misrepresentations, charging upon our soldiers most inhuman acts and terrible monstrosities. In fact, the vocabulary of billingsgate is totally inadequate to express their ideas of our fallen and degraded nature. And yet, these were the invited guests, social friends and boon companions of people living amongst us! the moral of which plainly points us to the manly, determined course which characterized the people of New-Orleans in the face of the Federal fleet, when the emblem of Northern tyranny was minted by a few miscreants in their midst.

IRON-CLAD FORTIFICATIONS.

From the Richmond Dispatch.

An article appeared not long ago in one of the British periodicals, showing that fortifications, as well as gunboats, could be sheathed with iron and made entirely impervious to the assault of floating iron batteries. One of the two, the iron-clad fortifications, would evidently be superior. The South, which has shown the world what can be done by iron-clad vessels, should now make an exhibition of the practicability of iron-clad land defences. We would suggest to the ladies of Richmond that they should devote the iron intended for their gunboat to this purpose, and we call the attention of the Government and of the city authorities to the necessity of arming in this way at once, some of the defences on the river approaches to the city. There is enough old iron, as we have said again and again, among the households of Richmond, to furnish a shield for the whole city against the river attacks of the enemy. But the authorities must be at the pains to send carts and collect it, which they ought to have done long ago.

A REMARKABLE GUN.

From the Richmond Dispatch.

The Williams Gun has been achieving wonders wherever it has been tried. A Kentucky officer, with a few marksmen, took it out a few days ago, and it brought down the game at eighteen hundred yards, just twice the longest range of the enemy's weapons. At twelve hundred yards it was as reliable as most guns at three hundred. The inventor of this gun lives within a stone's throw of the place where we write. This deadly weapon has been invented a whole year, during which time he had sought in vain to have it introduced. At last he has succeeded. The General who ordered the experiments which have resulted as are described, has given such an account of them that a certain number has been ordered. If we had had them a year ago, they might by this time have changed the whole face of the war.

GUNBOATS.

From the Memphis Argus, May 6.

What were gunboats made for? Before this war commenced, when the old idea, that war means fighting, prevailed, it was generally understood that a navy was designed for some use, and that when a Government, during a war, expended time and money in the construction and armament of gunboats, floating batteries and like aquatic concerns, something was to be done in the way of fighting. It was not generally understood, then, that one of the main objects of a fleet of gunboats was to keep a large number of shoulder-strapped gentry out of mischief, and provide employment for crews without either ever being brought within sight of an enemy. But the old fogies who fondly believed that gunboats were designed, like everything else, to be of some use, have had their eyes opened not a little by the events of the past few months.

We made a great splurge with gunboats on the Mississippi. Immense sums of money were expended upon them, and some as fine ordnance as the Confederacy possessed was placed at the disposal of the commanders, who, having "seen service," were of course expected to do something—else why did they accept their positions?

Will some one inform us of a single benefit resulting to the Confederacy from the fleet which passed Memphis with pomp and parade before the disgraceful hullabaloo at New-Madrid? Was a single Federal thereby disconcerted? Were any of the Yankee batteries, constructed on the banks, almost within view of the "flotilla," disturbed?

AGRARIANISM AND APPREHENSION.

From the Memphis Avalanche, May 7.

It is not improbable that a large quantity of corn and molasses may be devoted to destruction. Both articles, within a very brief period, have wonderfully advanced in price. To say that this is occasioned by scarcity would be asserting that which is not true. By a little investigation, there would be found here much more than has been usual at this season of the year; and that they should be advanced to a fabulous value is not a little remarkable, unless their value is measured by the prices of meats.

It is suggested that it would not be amiss to take time by the forelock; and, while it may be done without hurry and bustle, a quantity should be distributed among the needy, who have not the ability to purchase at present prices, and may be driven to desperate most in a short time. This might be done, without fear of famine, through the offices of the gentlemen who have benevolently taken charge of the Free Market. It might be conveniently done while there is no hurry. How much better would it be to distribute this very excellent substitute for meat, when the latter cannot be had, than to see it destroyed and of no use to anybody! This suggestion is made for the notice of those who are not disposed to put off everything till the last moment.

MATTERS AT HUNTSVILLE.

We find the following in the Mobile Evening News, of the 2d:

Persons escaped from Huntsville state its occupation by the enemy, inform us that the merchants all closed their places of business after the town passed into possession of the enemy. Gen. Mitchel, the Federal commander, ordered them to open the stores or he would open them himself, and carried his tyranny further by compelling them to receive the shinplasters of the Lincoln Government in payment for all goods which his soldiers and officers might wish to purchase. This, of course, is mere robbery, perpetrated in a new and ingenious manner.

The citizens and soldiers are frantic and prer- [illegible] and carry things with a high hand. Houses and other private property are pressed into service. It was reported in Huntsville that Judge George W. Lane would be appointed by Lincoln Military Governor of the State of Alabama. He will have an agreeable and harmonious time administering the functions of his office over the several hundred thousand rebellious subjects. He will have to keep up a considerable standing army for an indefinite number of years, and have a powerful and trusty body-guard to watch over the safety of his regal person.

THE COMING BATTLE AT CORINTH.

ADDRESS OF GEN. BRAGG.

HEADQUARTERS GENERAL COMM'D, ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI, CORINTH, May 1, 1862.

SOLDIERS: You are again about to encounter the mercenary invader who pollutes the sacred soil of our beloved country. Several positions by you will driven from his chosen position, with a loss of his artillery and his honor, at Shiloh, when double your numbers, he now approaches cautiously and timidly, unwilling to advance, unable to retreat. Could his rank and file enjoy a Freeman's fight, but one would remain within our limits but they are goaded on under a tyrant's lash by desperate leaders, whose only safety lies in success.

Such a foe, such cause, forget to conquer freemen, battling upon their own soil.

You will encounter him in your chosen position, strong by nature and improved by art, away from his main support and reliance—gunboats and heavy batteries—and, for the first time in this war, with nearly equal numbers. The slight reverses we have met on the sea-board have worked us good as well as evil. The brave troops so long retained there have hastened to swell our numbers, while the gallant Van Dorn and Invincible Price, with the ever successful "army of the West," are now in your midst, with numbers almost equaling the "army of Shiloh." We have, then, but to strike and destroy; and, as the enemy's whole resources are concentrated here, we shall not only redeem Tennessee, Kentucky and Missouri at one blow, but open the portals of the whole Northwest.

BRAXTON BRAGG.

[Official.] General Commanding Second Corps.
GEO. G. GARNER, Asst Adjt.-Gen.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 22.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY MISSISSIPPI, CORINTH, Miss., April 28, 1862.

All strangers arriving at Corinth will be required to register their names in the office of the Provost-Marshal. They must state at the same time by what authority and for what purpose they have come within the lines of this army, and for what number of days their business will require their residence within said lines. All persons found without apparent business will be reported promptly by the Provost-Marshal to the commanding officer of the post for his action.

By command of Gen. BEAUREGARD.
THOS. JORDAN, A. A.-Gen.

A REPORT BY GEN. BEAUREGARD.

CORINTH, Miss., April 17.—Reports of commanders show that fourteen pieces of the enemy's artillery were brought from the field of battle.

Over 25 stand of colors and 3,000 prisoners were captured.

My general reports of the battle will be sent in two or three days. I have applied for an exchange of prisoners for those taken at New Madrid Bend.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

To Gen. R. D. Lee, Acting General-in-Chief, Richmond, Va.

BEAUREGARD TO HIS SOLDIERS.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI, CORINTH, April 17, 1862.

Soldiers of the Army of Mississippi:

You have bravely fought the invaders of your soil for two days, in his own position, fought your superior in numbers, in arms, in all the appliances of war. Your success has been great. His losses have been immense—outnumbering yours in all save in personal worth of the slain. You drove him from his camps to the shelter of his iron-clad gunboats, which alone saved him from complete disaster. You captured his artillery, more than twenty-five flags and standards, and took over three thousand prisoners.

You have done your duty. Your Commanding General thanks you. Your countrymen are proud of your deeds on the bloody field of Shiloh, and confident of the ultimate success of your valor.

Soldiers, untoward events saved the enemy from annihilation. His insolent presence still pollutes your soil. His hostile flag still taunts before you. There can be no peace as long as these things are.

Trusting that God is with us, as he was with our fathers, let us seek to be worthy of his favor, and resolve to be independent or perish in the struggle.

By the Commanding General.
[Official] G. T. BEAUREGARD.

ITEMS FROM THE SOUTH.

CAIRO, Wednesday, May 14.

Memphis papers of the 11th are received.

A dispatch from Natchez states that the Federal fleet had returned to New-Orleans.

The Appeal, commenting on the growing disposition on the part of the citizens to refuse the Confederate notes, characterizes the parties as traitors.

The same journal says that the only condition upon which the South will accept peace, is recognition and independence, not only of the Cotton States, but of every Border State whose people desire an alliance with the Confederacy.

The Provost-Marshal of Memphis has ordered the arrest of all persons refusing to take Confederate money in payment of goods.

The Appeal of the 11th says: "We have certain intelligence that Gen. Halleck's army has lost over 5,000 by desertion, the country between the Tennessee River and Kentucky being full of them. The whole of the Fortieth Ohio deserted and disbanded after the battle of the 7th. Numbers of Kentuckians and Missourians followed their example, in consequence of disaffection produced by the late Anti-Slavery movements in Congress.

A report has been brought from Little Rock that Gen. Curtis' Division of the National army has commenced to march upon the Capital of Arkansas, and says that Gen. Frazer is marching to the same point from Pocahontas.

The following rebel official dispatches are published:

"DESARC, ARK., Saturday, May 10.

"The enemy are reported to have been in Augusta, Jackson County. They took possession of all the cotton in the neighborhood. They are reported in considerable force at Jacksonport and Batesville. Their destination is unknown. They are reported to be from 6,000 to 10,000 strong. Seventeen hundred bales of cotton were burned here to-day."

CORINTH, Saturday, May 10.

Since the terrible thrashing administered to Gen. Pope's command yesterday by Generals Price and Van Dorn, we have had no further demonstrations. Matters are accordingly quiet this morning.

The following characteristic message from Jeff. Thompson is published:

"FORT WRIGHT, Saturday, May 10.

We Missourians concluded to celebrate to-day the anniversary of the Camp Jackson massacre. We have shown the enemy that we still own the Mississippi, and can run the blockade whenever we choose. We gave them a few bullets this morning to show them our power, and after a handsome scrimmage of thirty minutes, we backed down the river with two killed and eight slightly wounded. Our officers are all safe and our gunboats uninjured. All, from the Commodore down to the powder-boys, behaved like soldiers."

The Appeal publishes this dispatch without comment.

A DESERTER SHOT.

From the Memphis Avalanche, April 28.

On Friday morning last, at Grand Junction, a deserter from Capt. A. B. Rawlins's Company, Col. B. D. Harman's Regiment, named Harris, from Holly Springs, Miss., underwent the extreme penalty of his offence. It seems that he had first joined a Louisiana regiment, and received the bounty, and had deserted, attaching himself to another regiment, again securing bounty. It was said that he had practiced this trick several times, but having deserted Col. Harman's Regiment, which he had joined for the bounty, he was arrested, and was about to be favored with a severe flogging, and returned out of the service, when an order for a trial by Court-martial was received, and this tribunal sentenced him to the penalty of death. Marched to the ground, he waived the ceremony of having his eyes bandaged, and folding his arms, and bidding the detail to make sure work, he met his fate undaunted. The detail of twelve men was made from a Louisiana battalion, and twelve muskets, six loaded with ball, and the same number with blank cartridges, handed to them. At the word they all fired, two balls striking the prisoner in the head, two in the breast, and two in the abdomen. They were all necessarily fatal, and he fell instantly dead, nor made a struggle. The ceremony was witnessed by about three hundred persons, in addition to the forces under Col. Harman's command.

A SHOCK AND A HINT.

From the Memphis Avalanche, April 28.

A rumor is current in the city—whence originating we are unable to say—that Columbus, Mississippi, had been entered by a detachment of Federal cavalry, from North Alabama, who destroyed the Government stores and iron works. We only mention this for the purpose of expressing a doubt as to its truth, and also to call the attention of the authorities to the propriety of effectually guarding against any such disaster.

MORE SPIES.

The Richmond Enquirer (Administration organ) in alluding to the recent reprieve of the two condemned spies, says:

"We feel now free to state, that, though the condemned men have been respited for a few days by the President, they will certainly be hung. We learn that they have made several important revelations concerning some very high dignitaries in our Government. This, however, we merely mention as a rumor."

MISCELLANEOUS.

At the late term of the Fulton (Georgia) Superior Court, Judge Bass, among other northern circuits charge to the Grand Jury, recommended the prosecution of all foreign-born citizens who have exercised the right of citizenship and now claim exemption from military service in the Confederate army upon the ground that they are subjects of a foreign Government. He contended that they were guilty of a misdemeanor, and ought to be sent to the Penitentiary.

The Jonesboro (Tenn.) Express learns that a fearful disease has made its appearance in Carter County, Tenn. The symptoms of the disease are similar to those of concentric fever or cold plague. In a few hours its victim is dead. Last Monday morning there were four corpses in one house. In the last ten days twenty or thirty have fallen before it, and it was still on the increase.

A gentleman informs the Planters' Banner that Gov. Moore told him that he "has uniformly ordered his Colonels throughout the State not to leave one white man on every plantation."

The schooner Sir Robert Peel, with a valuable cargo, was destroyed on the coast of South Carolina to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

A flatboat, containing one hundred hogsheads sugar, sunk at the Memphis landing on the night of the 24th ult.

The Marion (N. C.) Express notices a new pistol, which can be made twenty-four times without reloading.

The Third Alabama Regiment has given $1,000 toward building a gunboat for the defence of Alabama.

The churches of Georgetown, S. C., have given their bells to the Confederacy.

The Nashville Methodist publishing house will soon commence operations in Mobile.

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

GEN. HALLECK'S ARMY.

Correspondence of the Chicago Post.

PITTSBURGH LANDING, Saturday, May 3, 1862.

Not a day passes without engagements of a trifling nature, in which, not unfrequently, several hundred are engaged. The division of the army under Gen. Pope, on Tuesday last, were engaged in an important action of this nature at Monterey, capturing sixty prisoners, breaking up a camp of the enemy, and occupying to force the ground from which they retreated. But in the action twenty of our men were killed and wounded.

Strategy is reported to be Gen. Beauregard's special in on Wednesday that it was his fainting. About eight miles above Hamburgh (which is itself located four miles up the river from Pittsburgh Landing) an effort was made on that day to ferry to the opposite side of the river a large force of rebels, by means of ill-constructed boats propelled by horse-power. The supposed object of the movement was to regain possession of Savanna, and perhaps cut off our communication from below, though in what manner it was anticipated this could be done without the aid of artillery is one of those mysteries common to rebellion movements, and as yet unexplained. The operation was discovered. The gunboat Tyler was immediately dispatched, but did not reach the point until some eight hundred of the enemy had been ferried across, and were safe on the east bank of the river.

The gunboat opened fire upon those who were left, scattering them in every direction, and drove off and to the transportation of other troops by herding the boats to the west bank, or edge. Savanna is considerably strengthened by a gunboat and an additional force of cavalry. No attack has been yet made upon it, nor have the rebels in that vicinity discovered any traces of the rebels who had succeeded in crossing. They are yet back in the country, cut off from the main army, and liable at any time to be captured by our forces.

A new regiment of rebel cavalry is reported to have been discovered to-day, some four miles in the rear of Savanna, and the town is all excitement in consequence of occasional firing, seemingly between our pickets in the rear of the town and the enemy, who succeeded in crossing above.

To-day it is reported that a force, consisting of eight companies, supported by a circuitous march in gaining access to the railroad in the rear of Corinth, and destroyed the track between that place and Memphis, for a distance of half a mile. The work is said to be done in a manner which will prove difficult for several days at least to cutting off supplies from Beauregard's army, and his retreat by this method of transportation. The report has not been in time in several officers who arrived on this afternoon.

By the hospital reports, it is ascertained that there are at the present time 1,400 sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals at Savanna. Seven hundred of them are placed in the latter category, many of them badly injured by gunshot wounds. There are hundreds now suffering, who, had they had extended to them at the time of their injury that care and attention which the hospitals afforded them, would, in all probability, have been impossible to render, with the comparatively small corps of surgeons present at the time of the battle, might now be in active service and upon duty. You who have been told that the wounded had been removed from the hospitals here—that the buildings were empty, cleaned, and ready to receive the unfortunate from another contest, will be surprised to learn that they are yet crowded almost to repletion.

MAY 3—5 P. M.

Yesterday (Sunday) morning, Gen. Pope planted a battery in an exposed position in a field a short distance in advance of Farmington, leaving a small force of infantry to protect it, with the intention of drawing on a force of rebels who were encamped about a mile beyond. This strategetic scheme succeeded admirably, for in about an hour two Mississippi and a Louisiana Regiment came through the woods on double quick and charged on the battery. They had no sooner got clear of the timber than Gen. Pope, whose force was drawn up in ambush, completely surrounded the rebels, taking over 2,000 prisoners, who were brought into our camp and taken to the rear.

On the same day, a cavalry reconnoissance was made from the centre of our lines toward Corinth. The cavalry met a small force of rebel infantry, whom they completely routed, killing and wounding several and taking fifty-three prisoners. The entire army was ordered to be in readiness to march at midnight on Sunday with three days' rations, but in consequence of the impassible condition of the roads, the order was countermanded. It rained incessantly during from Sunday noon until midnight, rendering the roads utterly impassible. Back water from the Tennessee, flowing into Corinth, has rendered it necessary to construct several bridges on new roads recently built.

While one of the heavy siege guns was being taken over a small bridge, it gave way, drowning the teamster and six mules.

There is no longer any doubt that the enemy intend to make a desperate fight at Corinth. They are at work night and day strengthening their works. On Tuesday they received large reinforcements, supposed to be Lovell's command from New-Orleans.

Gen. Halleck is making every movement with the greatest caution, and with a certain knowledge beforehand that it will succeed as he intends it.

No civilians are allowed within the lines of the army under any circumstances. All boats at the landings are strongly guarded, and no one is allowed to leave them. Gov. Yates arrived in the steamer Champion, with corps of surgeons and nurses, but none of them were permitted to land.

Large quantities of sutler stores have recently arrived, and are piled up on the bank; but through the operation of an order of Gen. Halleck's, they are not permitted to be taken to the camps.

Morgan's guerrillas fire on nearly every boat which passes up or down the river. Our gunboats are constantly plying up and down, shelling the woods in every direction.

Our pickets at Savanna were attacked on Sunday by a large force of rebels, and driven in some distance, but reinforcements arriving, the rebels retreated back to the woods, pursued by two companies of cavalry, who brought in a number of prisoners.

THE BATTLE OF SHILOH.

LETTER FROM GEN. SMITH.

The following letter from Gen. Morgan L. Smith, which we find in the St. Louis Republican, answers the question whether or not our army was surprised:

SAVANNA, TENN., Saturday, May 3, 1862.

To the Editor of the Republican:

I learn through the public Press that this army was surprised. There was no surprise, and here is the whole secret of the battle on Sunday, the 16th ultimo:

You will notice that a large proportion of the troops engaged on that day were high-numbered regiments, and just mustered in, and some of them had just received their arms.

They were attacked vigorously by the enemy's best troops, and by far superior numbers. In the name of common sense, what other result could be expected? All the old regiments fell back in good order, and only when ordered to do so. The only thing to be astonished about is, that those new Ohio regiments stood their ground as well as they did. Some of the green regiments fell back in disorder when hard pressed, but not (with very few exceptions) until they had created great havoc in the enemy's ranks. That their loss in killed was in proportion to ours three to two, I have no doubt, and I do not think any intelligent officer, who walked over the ground before the interments commenced, had any. A few officers and men behaved in the most cowardly manner; that some of them are going yet, with an imaginary Minie. Beauregard with one of theirs long home-made Enfield in pursuit, spreading the news that "their regiments were surprised and all cut to pieces," they being about the only survivors, is more than probable. This is to cover their delinquencies.

I have more faith in our volunteer army and our generals now than ever before. Jeff. and Company's reign is near an end.

I send this to you for publication, in answer to letters from acquaintances asking "By whose fault the army was surprised."

Yours truly, MORGAN L. SMITH.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

THE REBELLION.

The most important news this morning is unwelcome. A dispatch from Williamsburgh, established by Gen. MCCLELLAN, states that the gunboats Galena, Monitor, Naugatuck, Aroostook and Port Royal have made an attack upon Fort Darling, which stands below Richmond, and have been repulsed with considerable loss. A portion of the fleet had returned to Jamestown Island, opposite Williamsburgh, where seventeen of our men had been interred. The 100-pounder gun on board the Naugatuck exploded at the first fire. No particulars of the engagement are given, but they will probably reach us in time for to-morrow's paper.

The dispatches this morning confirm the report of the capture of Pensacola—or rather of its evacuation by the rebels and occupation by our forces.

Further reports from Gen. HALLECK's army state that Beauregard has sent in a flag of truce asking for a cessation of the war. There is little likelihood that the report is true. Such a request would, of course, be granted, and no shrewd schemer as BEAUREGARD would hardly give such an indication of weakness, unless it was to procure a surrender. It may, indeed, be possible that he is anxious to await the determination of affairs in Richmond before resolving upon his course.

A day or two after the naval engagement off Fort Pillow, the rebels perpetrated a practical joke which deserves mention for its impudence. They sent a flag of truce to Capt. DAVIS, desiring to know on what terms he would surrender. Our gunboats are now protected from the rebel rams by cotton bales.

The Chicago Journal states that the steam rams which have for some time been in course of construction, at Louisville and other points on the Ohio River, are at last completed, and on their way to their destination. It adds: "It is needless to attempt to disguise the fact that the recent engagement between our fleet and that of the rebels could but little short of being a reverse on our side. The rebel rams accomplished no small amount of damage to two or three of our gunboats, and our entire fleet barely succeeded in repulsing the attacking force, which, repairs begun, will return to the attack. With rams in our flotilla, we may confidently anticipate a great victory in the next engagement."

The rebels are somewhat contradictory in their reports of the losses sustained by them in the recent naval battle above Fort Wright. The Memphis Appeal of the 11th contains a letter putting the figures at 6 killed, and 16 wounded; while a letter in the Avalanche of the 13th puts them at 9 killed, and 6 wounded. The rebel letter-writers with the fleet at the first, should compare notes.

The steam-transport Atlantic arrived at this port yesterday from Port Royal, bringing the mails and a quantity of cotton. She brings intelligence that the rebel steamer Planter had arrived at Port Royal from Charleston, in charge of her contraband pilot and crew, who turned her over to Uncle Sam. She had on board seven heavy guns, beside an 8-inch rifled one, intended to have been mounted on Fort Ripley, a work in course of construction on the "Middle Ground," in Charleston Harbor.

Gen. GRANT telegraphs to the War Department from Huntsville, on the Memphis Cap. Railroad, that a detachment of seventeen of his men—an advance guard to Linden, was attacked at the latter place on Thursday, by a large body of rebel cavalry, and overpowered; though the men fought heavily from the shelter of the depôt. One man was killed, and fourteen taken prisoners—three of whom were wounded. The enemy then hastily retired, on the approach of a larger body of Col. GRANT's force.

A dispatch from Fortress Monroe states that Gen. WOOL will probably remove his headquarters to Norfolk. This may be the preparatory step to a movement down the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad to Weldon.

GENERAL NEWS.

The steamship Great Eastern arrived at this port yesterday morning, having left Milford-Haven on the 6th inst. Her advices are two days later than were received by the America. The news is of very little importance. The principal item is the question of the Paris Patrie, of the 4th inst., that M. MERCIER, the French Minister to this country, had a long conference with JEFF. DAVIS, on the occasion of his late visit to Richmond, and that his visit was entirely of a political character, and understood by President LINCOLN. The Captain of the Emily St. Pierre, who recently recovered his ship from a prize crew and took her to Liverpool, has been the recipient of marked honors, a service of plate and a gold chronometer having been presented him by merchants of Liverpool and others, together with other marks of appreciation of his conduct. The owners of the Emily St. Pierre had made him a present of $2,000, and intended to provide handsomely for his companions. There had been a decline in the Liverpool Cotton Market, and American Securities were lower.

Parson BROWNLOW delivered an address in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening, to an audience of not less than 3,000 persons. He was most cordially welcomed, and the statement of the mass of the Union men at the South excited the deepest interest. He will deliver an address at the Athenæum on Monday evening.

The Louisville Journal enumerates several incidents which show conclusively that rebel sympathizers all along the route of the guerrilla MORGAN knew of his coming before he made his last raid into Kentucky. It infers that he must have active spies scattered through the State.

Dr. I. I. HAYES, well known as the leader of the Arctic Expedition, having received the appointment of Brigade Surgeon, his friends in Philadelphia have presented to him, as a testimonial of their sense of his services and zeal, a sword, sash, belt, and other personal equipment; also, a fine bridle, saddle and housings for his horse.

Capt. FULTON, of the Mississippi, which had such an unfortunate voyage to the Gulf, has returned to Boston, Gen. BUTLER having released him from arrest.

Hon. H. B. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, has written a letter to his constituents explaining the reasons of his voting in opposition to the bill recently passed by Congress abolishing Slavery in the District of Columbia. He does not think this the time to agitate the Slavery question, and believes it wrong to abolish the institution anywhere without the consent of the master.

A very large meeting of members of the Bar was held at the Astor House, yesterday afternoon, with a view to hear an explanation from Mr. ROWLAND JAMES in regard to the recent assault on his character. Mr. BRADFORD presided, and Mr. JAMES made an effective statement in his own defence. After remarks by LEVI S. CHATFIELD, JOHN H. WHITE, Mr. SHERWOOD and others, the meeting resolved unanimously that Mr. JAMES was a persecuted man, and that there was no cause for revoking his license as a member of the New-York Bar.

Breadstuffs were generally lower on Saturday, having been depressed by the heavy receipts and the unfavorable market advices from England. Transactions in Coffee and Sugars were quite extensive, at full rates. Provisions were quiet, as were also Cotton, Fish, Hemp, Molasses, Naval Stores, Rice, Seeds, Spices and Metals. Hay, Hides, Leather, Whale Oil, Tallow, Tobacco and Wool were in fair demand. Whisky declined slightly. The Freight market was steady, though not very active.

The War and Its Lessons—The Uses of Adversity.

We hear a good deal said about the evil effects of the war, and no one can deny that such ill effects are to be anticipated. Not only are they to be found in the lives lost, in the sorrow which invades so many homes, in the destruction of property and the heavy load of debt with which the country will be burdened for long years, but they will also be seen in the demoralization of very many of our soldiers, the evil habits contracted in the moral miasma which pervades the camp, and all the bad influences which necessarily spring from war, and especially from such a war as the present.

But the results of it are not to be only evil. We think we can see many ways in which good is to spring up and bear a plentiful harvest out of this unpromising soil. Great advantage will result to the physical health of the country. We know that there will be left many men whose limbs will be maimed, and their constitutions shattered by wounds or disease. But all our soldiers who escape these enemies will be made rugged, toughened and bronzed by the labors of the camp, the march, and the battle-field. They will gain in strength and endurance and in a love for these exercises which increase strength and endurance. And not they alone. The impulse which must be given to athletic exercises among the people by the military spirit which has arisen among us, cannot but have a most favorable effect. There is many a young man who dreaded to enter upon the burdens of the war, because he had failed in cultivating his physical powers, and was not strong enough to carry a musket, who will hereafter strengthen himself and see to it that his children are better cared for in that respect than he was. The taste for military organizations will inevitably be far more prevalent than it has been. Muscle will be more honored than ever, and those habits and that training which strengthen it will everywhere be adopted. We see on every hand projects for introducing military drill into our schools, and laws being passed to put our militia systems on a better footing. And, moreover, the attention which is being paid to sanitary matters in our armies cannot fail to bring forth fruits of the greatest advantage to the people. We shall be surprised if, from and after the year 1861, the nation is not a nation of healthier men.

But bodily health is not the only good to be sought. There are moral effects to be anticipated from this war. We think that one very strong moral lesson will be burned in upon this people, so that they will never forget it. And that is, that mere proclamations of a love for freedom will never save a people, so long as the spirit of liberty is continually outraged among them. No people have had the word liberty more upon their lips than the Southern people. No men have prided themselves more upon their being a free people. But they continued to maintain the inconsistency which JEFFERSON deplored between the Declaration of Independence and the practice of Slavery, until at last they could not see that there was any inconsistency, and finally changed the very truth into a lie, and based their boasted freedom upon Slavery, as the head of the corner. Hence was their ruin speedy and utter, and the barbarities, the frauds and crimes, the unmanliness and treachery which have stained their short-lived struggle for existence as a separate nation, will, to the latest day, proclaim to this people that Slavery is a soil from which no good fruit can spring, and that when the love of Slavery dwells in the hearts of a people, no professions of love for freedom will prevent the rapid decline of those qualities which make a nation worthy in the world,—while a true love of universal freedom, springing from the idea of the equality of men as children of one Father, is the fruitful mother of all growths in civilization not only, but in those highest qualities which are alone able to maintain civilization. To have learned this one lesson is worth no small struggle and sacrifice.

The war has also given unwonted growth to patriotism at the North. Our country has lived a life of such perfect ease, heretofore, that there had been no great call for love of country. Now, the straits which our country has been in, the dangers which beset her, and all the sacrifices which the people have made for her, what they have done and borne for love of country, will make that love grow and increase in every breast. We shall be more ready, hereafter, to sacrifice our time, our money, our friends, our party feelings and political animosities, when the fatherland needs the sacrifice, than we have been heretofore.

And as the contemplation of noble deeds is ennobling, so must there be for this people great gain in the examples of glorious deeds of which the war is full. The deeds of our Revolutionary fathers have ever since borne good fruit among their sons. The incorruptibility of PAULDING and VAN WART, contrasted with the treachery of ARNOLD, has made many a man more honest and true. The bravery of our many heroes, both on land and sea, has fired the heart of many a boy long after the sea or the land had received their mortal remains. So will it be again. The fidelity of the Abdiels of our army and navy when treason and perjury were rife; the courage of the mighty army of heroes who have gone down to their bloody graves in their country's cause, many of them unknown to the world, but known to friends and families, to whom their memory will be a most precious inheritance; and the living presence of those whom death has spared, even where the death-shots flew thickest; the many noble qualities, of which this war has brought forth innumerable shining examples—all these cannot be lost. We cannot rejoice over the glory of our friends, nor have our hearts thrilled and our eyes filled by the narration of some gallant deed, and then turn away readily to deeds that are mean and base. The war has raised us out of the slough into which prosperity was sinking us. It has made us feel that there are things, in comparison with which property or even life is as nothing. It has vivified the spiritual element among us. Our charities should be more widespread; our sympathies more tender; our love for all things that are noble and lovely and of good report, more fervent; our Christianity more genuine.

There will be ill enough resulting from the war at the best. Let us cultivate the good which shall spring from it, so that the ill may be speedily overpowered, and the good alone remain as a harvest for posterity.

An Anniversary of Bigotry and Blood.

The 17th of May was the three hundredth anniversary of one of those sad and terrible events which deface the records of humanity. At this late period, notwithstanding the distressing scenes which the conflict of unruly human passions still evokes, civilized nations, by common and tacit consent, agree to let the recollection of mutual wrongs and outrages inflicted in past times slumber. Weakness and wickedness are, or have been, too universal to be charged on any one race or people alone, and, in the general progress of mankind, individual cases of atrocity are, finally, overborne and blotted out of the account.

The present year, however, has been signalized by the revival in France of the terrible memories that belong to the 17th of May, 1562. Monseigneur PLANTIER, Bishop of Nîmes, in his address for the Easter season of the present year, called upon the faithful in his diocese to celebrate with the most solemn formalities a jubilee on the 17th of May, in commemoration of the events that transpired in the City of Toulouse on the date we have given. The public mind of France, nay, of all Europe, revolted at this renewal of old prejudices and resentments so unwisely conjured up in the midst of a great, peaceful, and prosperous community. The entire Press of England and Continental Europe denounced the proposed celebration, and, finally, the Emperor authoritatively forbade it. Throughout France, there seemed to be but one feeling, and the Catholic clergy were among the very first to deplore a suggestion so inconsistent and impolitic. But the feeling awakened produced a deep impression upon millions, and even in the United States there have not been wanting those who, either naturally ill-disposed, or poisoned by fanaticism, have made this occurrence the theme of unmerited accusations.

The historical facts connected with the day may prove interesting, especially as their plain recital precludes the effect that is produced by garbled or distorted sensation narratives.

In May, 1562, some Protestants in Toulouse were engaged in burying the body of a woman in their own quarter. The Catholics of the city alleged that the deceased was of their faith, and urged that she could be buried only in their consecrated ground. Being refused, the unruly of their number attacked the funeral cortège and got possession of the body. A furious struggle in the street ensued, in which all the evil elements of the population on both sides joined. The result was what would follow riots of similar magnitude in a large city at the present day. Human life was sacrificed on both sides. The blood shed inspired a thirst for more. The tocsin was sounded, and the Catholic populace, being very much more numerous than their adversaries, in due time overcame their resistance on the streets, and further dreadful scenes occurred. A large majority of the Parliament there sitting took part against the Protestants, and in their crimson robes of office hurried from point to point in the city, calling upon all the faithful, in the name of the King, to rush upon the Protestants, at the same time directing them to mark their houses, and to rally around the white-cross they were to adopt as their standard. This organized the struggle and gave it the highest sanction. The ignorant masses thus incited proceeded with their fearful work. The Protestants barricaded themselves in the City Hall, where they had several pieces of cannon. In order to dislodge them the adjacent houses were set on fire and the Parliament forbade the extinguishment of the flames.

But the besieged succeeded in beating down the burning houses with their artillery. Upon this, the Governor of Narbonne was sent to them with proposals of pacification—upon the condition that the Protestants should lay down their arms. They might then withdraw from the city in any direction they preferred. On the day of Pentecost, the latter having agreed to the terms, sallied forth without arms, during the performance of vespers, hoping thus to get away unmolested. But frightful cries soon announced the horrors that ensued. An immense multitude swarmed forth from the churches, and massacred the defenceless Huguenots. Parliament caused those who at first escaped to be put to death, and reinforcements of regular royal troops from Guyenne, led by MONTLUC, arrived in time to assist at the butchery. This fierce soldier says, in his memoirs, "I never saw so many heads fly." The number of the slain is set down at 4,000.

Parliament even went so far as to expel twenty-four of its members on suspicion of their being tolerant. All the capitouls or better class of the city were disgraced, their children despoiled of their titles and their property confiscated. These facts are succinctly but powerfully set forth by the new and brilliant French historian, HENRI MARTIN, in his Histoire de France, Vol. IX.; and such was the 17th of May, which it has this year been proposed to celebrate by a solemn festival, at least a whole week. On the recurrence of the first centennial anniversary it was termed the Festival of the Deliverance, and VOLTAIRE, with the biting sarcasm which distinguished him, styled it the Procession to thank God for four thousand assassinations.

This sad page of the past unfortunately belongs to a mighty volume in which are written the excesses to which the ambition, malice or jealousy of wicked leaders have so often impelled and do still impel the unthinking masses, and for which whole races are with equal thoughtlessness and injustice made responsible. Conspicuous as was the cruelty of this memorable massacre, equally conspicuous were the efforts of good men of all creeds and parties to allay the feud and save the weaker combatants. Even the King of France interposed his authority to arrest the outrage, but, unfortunately, too late.

One portion of the address of the Bishop of Nîmes is a bold denunciation of the errors of our own time:

"Never," he says, "have there been witnessed, during an equal period, a greater accumulation of reasons, more public perjuries, more shameless assaults on international law, more iniquitous aggressions, more real impiety cloaked under more hypocritical language, more barbarous butcheries, more odious conquests, more revolting insults upon the despoiled and vanquished. It may be asked whether history records an epoch on which blood and filth commingled have imprinted more disgusting stains. The conscience of Europe is struck with stony; one feels that all its springs are broken, overstrained or paralyzed by forgetfulness of the great ideas of right and the eternal principles of morality. The statue remains mute because no ray of sunshine more falls on its front."

One of the most curious confirmations of the Reverend Prelate's regret would be the resurrection of hatreds now, we hope, forever dead. The public opinion of Europe has so estimated the occasion, and here, such mournful annals only recur to contrast the charity, brotherhood and mutual conciliation that distinguish a free land and a liberal era from the military monarchies of a darker period. A common liberty rallies men of all creeds and races around one glorious ensign, and a common destiny unites them and cements their union, with the common blood they spill in its defence.

Our Trophies of War.

Senator WILSON has moved a resolution in Congress, that the names of our victories over the rebels shall be inscribed upon the regimental colors in our army. At the first glance, and to a people elated with the praiseworthy joy of overcoming those who are so wickedly attempting the overthrow of our country, such an idea may appear palatable; but a very little reflection will show that it is as unwise and impolitic as it is ungenerous.

However justified we are in putting forth all our strength for the crushing of this infernal insurrection, and in not abating one iota of our efforts until the last rebel has laid down his arms, in unconditional surrender to the majesty of the laws and institutions he has outraged,—we cannot, we must not forget who and what the people are against whom we are fighting. Even if the Southern masses, to a man, had their hearts engaged in their unholy war, we should still be bound to regard them in a different light from any ordinary foreign foe; but when, on the contrary, we have every reason to believe that multitudes have been reluctantly forced into the ranks of rebellion, and that hosts of others who are fighting cheerfully in the bad cause, are doing so under hideous delusions, propagated by selfish and designing leaders, but which the first ray of truth will dispel, it becomes doubly incumbent upon us to avoid anything that can tend to make forever impassable the gulf now temporarily yawning between the Northern and Southern sections of this great Republic.

While eminent statesmen of the Old World are, even now, looking upon the holiest cause that ever bound a people together as nothing but an insane "struggle for supremacy;" when one of the leading British journals has even gone far enough to say that this war is "fast brutalizing one section of the country," and that the North!—let us disprove these libels, by showing, in the very midst of triumph, the same magnanimity which has marked our course during the whole progress of this deplorable war. Mr. W. H. RUSSELL once complimented us by saying that "the North is not vindictive enough to succeed." Let us prove him also only partially right, by showing that, although we can succeed without vindictiveness, we also know how to enjoy our triumphs with generous and noble forbearance.

A cotemporary, in alluding to this subject, reminds us of the beautiful practice, common among the Greeks, of commemorating the victories of civil war by monuments of wood, which might pass away with one generation; while victories over foreign nations were recorded in enduring marble. This is a good example which we should not only strive to emulate but to surpass. Let us have no monumental records whatever of this fratricidal strife, but only such as are already self-engraven on the bleeding hearts of those who have survived the conflict—to teach us everlastingly the value of unity and mutual forbearance.

France may cherish her Marengos and Solferinos; England her Blenheims and Waterloos; and we can as naturally exult over the memory of a Cerro Gordo or Buena Vista; but the names we are now adding to the page of history, however much glory they may shed upon our courage and manhood, are tinged with blood of too unnatural a color for us to wish to think of them one moment after peace again sheds her blessings upon our now distracted country.

Rebellion has already written its own history throughout the land, in characters too hideous to require any addition from flaunting trophies; and posterity will need no such inducements to hold in undying execration those who could have deliberately plotted the ruin of the most liberal and beneficent of human Governments. The National authority once reasserted, and the ends of justice obtained, let us strive to banish the past as a frightful dream, and only use the lessons it inculcates, as a guide and warning to us in the boundless career yet open before us.

A MYTH ABOUT THE MERRIMAC.—A Washington telegram states that the Secessionists there claim that the blowing up of the Merrimac is a hoax and assert that she is still afloat! This is certainly a desperate attempt to bolster up their courage. If the testimony to the reality of the destruction—now fortified by that of several of her officers—who were on board when, in a drunken spree, as now appears, it was resolved to blow her up—be not convincing to even the most skeptical Secessionist mind, then would they not believe, though the Merrimac herself rose from the dead. Besides, if not destroyed, where is she? Every nook and corner of all the contiguous waters has been explored, and she is not an object one hides in his waistcoat pocket. The Merrimac will never more appear, save, perchance, as a phantom ship painted on a canvas of cloud, seen by some Prester John about the period of the Greek Kalends.

Rebel Falsehoods Exposed.

A main reliance of the rebels, during the whole course of the rebellion, as it was during their preliminary labors, has been incessant lying about themselves and us. The lies which they have told about us we have of course been able to contradict as they were uttered. Those which they have told about themselves, in many cases we have not been able to show up, because we could not get at the facts. It has been about as difficult to get accurate statements from the interior of rebeldom as from the polar regions. Their newspapers lied so persistently about us that we could never believe what they said about themselves, unless it told against them, and even then we were quite sure that the half was not told. And thus behind this close-drawn curtain they have built refuges of lies which have helped their cause very much both here and abroad, until they were found out. But now, as our forces are working their way behind this curtain, and getting at the secrets of the prison-house, many a thing is overthrown and made ridiculous which has for a while held forth as fierce and formidable a front as the pretended Quaker guns at Manassas.

Take, for instance, the following sentence from JEFF. DAVIS' Inaugural Address, no longer ago than Feb. 22:

"We may point to the fact that, through all the necessities of an unequal struggle, there has been no act on our part to impair personal liberty, or the freedom of speech, or thought, or of the Press. The Courts have been open, the judicial functions fully exercised, and every right of the peaceful citizen maintained as securely as if a war of invasion had not disturbed the land."

This most enormous falsehood may have deceived some few of those who desired to be deceived among us. It is quite likely to have been accepted for truth among the friends of the rebels abroad, for whose benefit it was doubtless chiefly put forth. But with every day since it was uttered, with every mile upon the forward path of our armies, that lie has depreciated in value, faster even than Confederate currency. For every such advance has set free some tongue which, till then, had been paralyzed by the iron hand of the rebellion; has brought to us some oppressed lover of the Union, whose simple narration of the wrongs and brutalities which he had seen and endured, stamped that statement as most befitting the dedication of that edifice of which the chief corner-stone, as was declared by STEPHENS, of Georgia, has been Slavery, and the other three, as Mr. G. F. TRAIN told John Bull, filling out Mr. STEPHENS' declaration, have been treason, robbery and perjury.

"Every right of the peaceful citizen maintained." Let us put against this statement the case of that Unionist living near Jacksonville, Fla., from whose farm some of our officers took some farm produce, leaving money for it on the table, as he said he dared not sell to them. That night the rebels seized him, held a mock trial for this heinous offence, cut off his head and placed it on one side of the road, leaving his body on the other, and putting up a placard calling upon the "Yankees" to come and take him.

"No act on our part to impair personal liberty, or freedom of speech or thought or of the Press." Put against this, as one instance out of many, the case of a Union man, living near Manassas, who was seized after the battle of Bull Run, and when discharged by the kind offices of a Secession neighbor, returned to his farm, and never left it again till after our forces occupied Manassas,—not leaving his own door-yard more than three or four times during that time, seeing no newspaper, conversing with no one whom he saw,—the whole of those long dreary months completely blotted out of his existence, except for the insults and outrages of the rebel soldiery, who stripped his farm of everything he had, without his daring to make even a complaint. Read the account of the Union men confined in the tobacco-warehouses in Richmond; the wrongs and hardships and cruelties inflicted upon them, because they were suspected of loving their country; read Parson BROWNLOW's narrative of the course of the rebellion in East Tennessee, and the sufferings of that patriotic people, and then DAVIS' statement will begin to appear in its true colors—and they will be read. The day is coming when we shall have access to the actual facts. We are beginning to obtain them now. This part of the history of the year has but lately seen the light; and New-Orleans will offer us fresh materials for it, and Memphis will soon follow. The whole history can never be written, but enough will escape into publicity to put JEFF. DAVIS high up upon the roll of those who are

"Much renowned
For lying, solid and profound."

NON-INTERVENTION OF FRANCE.—The tenor of our foreign advices renders it quite conclusive that no intervention in our affairs is contemplated by the French Government, and that Great Britain is irrevocably committed to neutrality. The Paris Patrie certainly admits that the mission of M. MERCIER was political, adding that its purport was previously made known to President LINCOLN. But the Patrie, notwithstanding its semi-official character, has been wholly committed in the interests of the South, and, if it had anything to tell adverse to the Government of the United States, or tending to discourage the projects of the North, would have told it greedily. There is every reason to believe that the facts were of another character, and were, accordingly, withheld.

Private advices which reach us from Paris, and from persons which we have reason to be satisfied, decidedly contradict the notion of the Emperor entertaining the first idea of forcible interposition. There is not the slightest doubt remaining of the utter truthlessness of the rumor. The British Press, from which we make interesting extracts, in other columns, take sensible ground against the feasibility and probable success of interference, whatever form it may be made to assume. They prove, what seems hardly to need demonstration, that for France to take sides with the South would be to prolong the ruinous contest indefinitely, leaving the leading classes of Europe to pay all the bitter consequences of the mistake.

GEN. HUNTER'S ORDER.—We have definite advices from Washington that the action of the President in the matter of Gen. HUNTER'S order, liberating the slaves in South Carolina, Georgia and Florida, will be in harmony with the prudent and conservative course he has heretofore taken on this question of Slavery, whenever it has come up for his practical action, in any form. Gen. HUNTER, in the issuing of the order, acted entirely upon his own responsibility, without authorization by the President, and without consultation with him. The course he took was antagonistic to the line marked out for him by the President, both by precedent and by instructions. It was not given to him, nor to any other General in the field, to decide a question of such momentous and enduring importance. The treatment of Slavery in the rebel States is a political problem, and not a military one; and while a commander may use all legitimate means to deprive the rebels of slaves used for military purposes, just as he may deprive them of warlike implements or stores, he cannot step beyond that and declare Slavery itself at an end. Gen. HUNTER was a subordinate of, and acting with, Gen. RAMSOUR, when the latter declared the slaves of rebels in Missouri emancipated; and he is acquainted with the action of the President upon that order. The policy of the Government has undergone no change since then, but, on the contrary, has been confirmed and illustrated by numerous examples.

It is understood that the President is now only waiting for official and authentic information concerning Gen. HUNTER'S order and its bearings, when he will take such action as the case demands. We have it from Washington that Mr. LINCOLN said yesterday, that "if HUNTER had either given free papers to slaves, or issued the proclamation attributed to him, he would immediately suspended him from his command." Gen. HUNTER is a skillful and energetic soldier, and much was expected from his military administration in the "Department of the South." The public will greatly regret that, by a single injudicious step, he should have rendered his removal necessary. A Military Governor has now been appointed for the Department; and it may be found that by the President's countermanding the obnoxious order of Gen. HUNTER, and confining him strictly in future to his military duties, his services as a soldier may yet be rendered available.

YELLOW FEVER ON THE SOUTHERN COAST, AND HOW TO AVOID IT.—We very much doubt the truth of the statement which comes from that foundry of falsehoods, Memphis, that the yellow fever has made its appearance at New-Orleans. It is probably thrown out as an attempt to terrify and demoralize the small National force occupying New-Orleans, to prevent the sending of reinforcements there, and to operate upon the mind of the North generally. It is between two and three months yet before the season for yellow fever, as an epidemic, will arrive in the South; and it may very well be doubted whether the malign agencies of nature will deviate from their ordinary course to forward the schemes of the rebels, or to sustain the tottering throne of Jeff. Davis.

But still it is likely that the yellow fever, following the law of periodicity, may appear this Summer or Fall in New-Orleans and along the Southern coast, and our unacclimated troops at Charleston, Savannah, Mobile and New-Orleans would probably suffer severely. What shall be done to prevent its ravages, or lessen its evils, if it does come? When the Allies in Mexico were threatened with the vomito and other coast fevers at Vera Cruz a few months ago, they asked permission of the Mexicans to remove their troops to the high lands some distance in the interior, which request was chivalrously granted by the people whom the Allies had come to fight, and of whose soil they were invaders. The topography and climatology of the States of the far South are essentially the same as in Mexico. But it would be no use to ask the rebel chivalry to allow our troops to move up into the high lands of South Carolina or the Gulf States—though it is quite likely they will reach there before yellow fever season. Yellow fever rages fearfully in Charleston, but it never goes to the Capital of the State, Columbia, 130 miles in the interior; it ravages Savannah, but does not go near Milledgeville; it desolates Mobile, but the air of Montgomery is untainted; it decimates New-Orleans, but loses much of its destructive power at Baton Rouge, and the more northerly parts of the State are free from it. Now why should not our troops, if it be necessary to garrison these States this Summer, remove up to those healthy localities, and leave a gunboat or two to take care of the cities and the coast? The thing is certainly practicable enough. It is a remarkable fact, also, that while yellow fever rages every year or two in Charleston, it has never, we are informed, made its appearance in Fort Sumter—so that our troops would be out of danger there. The fact is, there are plenty of extremely healthy localities in all the Cotton States; and it fortunately happens that in these localities are situated nearly all the points of strategic importance. So that the rebels, who calculate on the aid of Yellow Jack, will most likely, in this particular also, be baffled by the wit of the Yankees.

NEWS FROM WASHINGTON.

THE PROCLAMATION OF GEN. HUNTER.

HIS IMMEDIATE RECALL PROBABLE.

OUR SPECIAL WASHINGTON DISPATCHES.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, May 17.

FROM THE TWO GREAT ARMIES.

Advices from Gen. HALLECK's army, dated yesterday, and from Gen McCLELLAN's army, dated today, have been received at the War Department. The circular was in close proximity to the enemy, but no engagement had taken place. The latter was concentrating, and bringing up supplies, preparatory to an movement.

ORDNANCE STORES REMOVED.

Secretary EDWARD BATES returned to Washington today from his visit to Fortress Monroe and Norfolk. He is improved in health and spirits, and under no apprehension of Alexandria trouble with Frazer and Stuart. Secretary WEBSTER will remain perhaps three days longer at Hampton Roads.

GEN. HUNTER'S PROCLAMATION.

The more that is known of Gen. HUNTER's instructions from his Government, the more indefensible and inexplicable does his conduct appear. It is considered clear that the President not only did not authorize his freedom proclamation, freeing the slaves of these States, but he actually forbade him to issue any proclamation whatever. There was deep regret in Washington when Gen. BURNSIDE, who had done all the hard work in South Carolina and Georgia, was superseded, and HUNTER sent to reap the laurels of Pulaski's reduction. HUNTER lately abandoned the white Universal at Jacksonville, Fla., to treatment crueller from the whole, because, as he alleged, he had not forces enough in his Department to protect them. But while not able to free loyal whites from oppression, he undertakes the liberation of a million blacks. His removal from command is a foregone conclusion. The President to-day said to a Member that he was waiting for authentic information, and that if Gen. HUNTER had either given free rapply to rumors or issued the proclamation attributed to him, he would immediately suspend him from his command.

The funny article of Saturday on HUNTER's proclamation gave great satisfaction in Washington. Extreme Republicans were heard to pronounce it exclusive and conclusive. An able article in the Intelligencer of to-day is supposed to present the Administration policy for the rebellion in its relations to Slavery.

The Government has not authorized the raising of negro brigades in New-York or elsewhere. The employment of Indians and negroes in war is the distinctive honor of the rebellion.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

In Washington this morning six fugitive slaves were delivered up to their masters, under the operation of the Fugitive Slave law.

ILLNESS OF SENATOR RICE.

Senator RICE, of Minnesota, is dangerously ill from inflammation of the bowels.

RETURN OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.

Since yesterday, eight or ten fugitive slaves have been returned to their claimants. It is estimated there were in Washington recently about a thousand slaves, principally from Prince George's, Md., adjoining this District. At least forty slaveholders from that county were at the Court-house to-day, filing their petitions for reclamations. In some cases as many as twenty-one runaways are claimed by a single person. In several instances, after the Court had issued the necessary writs, the Marshal and his deputies were unable to find the fugitives, who, having by some means been informed of the judicial process, removed beyond the reach of arrest.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENCE.

The Destruction of the Merrimac a Certainty—Details of the Act as Given by One of her Gunners—Her Formidable Character—Censorship of the Press at Fortress Monroe—Col. Jessiman and Gen. Stargis—The Pacific Railroad—Labors of the Present Congress—The New Agricultural Department, &c.

From Our Own Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday Evening, May 14, 1862.

We are pretty thoroughly enlightened at last in regard to the destruction of the Merrimac, and the reasons that led to it. The details were to-day furnished to the War Department by one of her gunners, who came up last night from Norfolk. Some account will probably reach you by telegraph before you get this letter; but I imagine the details to be of sufficient general interest to warrant my giving them in full.

For the national blessing of her destruction, we are indebted to that jolly old humbug, Commodore TATTNALL. When the order was finally given to evacuate Norfolk, the question came sharply up as to the disposition of the Merrimac. The exigency was one demanding coolness and boldness, and it seems that TATTNALL had neither. He convened a council of war, however, on board the ship, and the knotty question was discussed in all its bearings. He was himself decidedly of the opinion that she could never be safely carried out to sea through our fleet, but was inclined to hope that she might be made of service in the defence of Richmond, if she could only be got there. Her draught was twenty-one feet, and at least five must be taken off to enable her to get up the river. This it was finally decided to attempt. She was taken over to Sewall's Point, (I think,) and there eased of a quantity of pig-iron which she had been carrying for ballast. This done, it was found that her draught was lessened only two and a half feet. A hundred and fifty tons of coal were next taken out, and still she drew more water than the channel afforded. She had spared every pound of meat that she could with safety, and it was impossible to make her any lighter. In this dilemma, TATTNALL decided on her destruction. The proper preparations were made, and the ship fired. The bold Captain waited awhile for her to blow up; but, having visions of invading rascals before his eyes, he beat a retreat for Richmond before the catastrophe was reached, leaving some of his subordinates to see the work completed. After burning about two and a half hours, the fire reached the magazine, and the Merrimac perished. It is a mortifying fatality, at the hands of her friends, involving in her destruction the budding hopes of her creators and their transcendental sympathizers, who had seen in her the ark of safety for their cause.

I don't know that we are fully aware of the magnitude of the danger we have escaped. Certain it is that the officers of the Merrimac in general had the highest confidence in her powers. Those who were on her during her fight with the Monitor are unhesitating in their belief that she would have destroyed that stubby little craft at the next encounter. They insist that the Monitor's shot inflicted positively no damage; that it was the firing of the Cumberland that did the mischief, and that the leak she sprung was occasioned by a strain when she broke off her submarine prow in running into our vessel. Before this leak was discovered she was making for the Monitor to finish her, but on finding herself so badly damaged, she was obliged to retreat.

It is said, too, that we greatly underrated her speed and activity. Previous to her destruction, she had been so improved as to be able to move backward with the same ease that she went forward. I have told that the officers of the Monitor became satisfied that they had underestimated her powers. Notwithstanding the [illegible] of the Rebels, we have been [illegible] for an attack upon Newport News, which we have been expecting for some days. The news that Gen. TAYLOR and his accomplices have gifted with prophetic knowledge and cool courage, they would have known before lightening her whether they could be so confidently expected to get her up the river. If we, then, as brave men, having their cause at heart, they should have tried to get her out to sea. A failure need have resulted in no worse result than the one they deliberately risked, excepting the personal risk to themselves; and that risk it was their duty to incur. If the information which I get is true, the effort would have had more chances of success than failure. On the whole, we are well rid of the monster, and I trust we never may see her like again—in the hands of an enemy.

As usual, the Government was unfortunate in its dispatches from Fortress Monroe, announcing the fall of Norfolk. First, we were told that the Navy-yard was saved; then when the agent of the Associated Press proposed a dispatch giving the facts, it was suppressed because it contradicted the one already sent. Finally, the truth had to be told. We really saved scarcely anything; the hospital, itself, was only spared by the rebels because it was occupied by their own sick and wounded. They did, however, leave us a large quantity of iron ware—anchors, &c.—and one fine gunboat, on the ways, and all ready for plating; which was certainly very kind or very stupid in them.

Here, in Washington, the air is heavy to-night with rumors of disaster to HALLECK. The Secessionists are elate; the Unionists uneasy. Still, we have heard nothing to cause such apprehensions. The rumor will have been confirmed or disproved before this reaches you.

Col. JESSIMAN is still in town, but is not expected to receive the promotion his friends ask. The President, in fact, has distinctly declined to send in his name to the Senate. The alleged reason is the strong opposition of the Border State members of Congress. Col. JESSIMAN, however, does not yet despair; and believes that he can secure a preponderance of influence, even amongst the cliques that oppose him.

Gen. STURGIS is also here; but I have not learned whether he has made any progress in disproving the charges brought against him.

We hear, too, from Kansas to-day, that Gen. CHARLES STURGIS, of that State, is lying dangerously ill of small-pox, in the hospital at Buffalo, N. Y. It is supposed that he was on his way to this city.

The Pacific Railroad bill does not seem destined to endure a very severe opposition in the Senate. Its friends confidently anticipate its speedy passage. Some efforts will be made to amend it; in fact, in some respects it needs change; but the prevailing feeling is that its interests must not be endangered.

On the whole, the present Congress bids fair to eclipse all its predecessors in enlightened, progressive, practical legislation. To say nothing of the financial measures resulting from the war, it will probably be able, in the bright record it leaves, to point to the pregnant act affirming the national policy of emancipation, the abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia, its prohibition in the Territories, a Homestead bill, a Pacific Railroad act, a law confiscating rebel property, and the creation of a distinct Agricultural Department in the Government. The latter measure, if I am not mistaken, the Times regards unfavorably, which is not singular in a city journal; but so long as the business of producing food is so poorly understood and practiced, and all other avocations are so crowded, it would certainly seem that Agriculture needs Government aid. One Monday morning, not long since, I had business at a large retail store in New-York, and was startled by the sight of a long line of men standing silent on each side of the room, like mourners waiting the movement of a funeral procession. On inquiry, I learned that they were all applicants for places! And yet every rural county in the United States exhibits vast spaces of vacant land, for want of the labor of these idle thousands who throng the stocked cities, clamoring for bread. We are not likely to make that needful article too cheap through over-production; meantime, let us encourage the art most necessary of all to the support of the human race.

I understand that President LINCOLN intends to return to Fortress Monroe; but I do not vouch for the statement. J. M. W.

RELIGIOUS EMEUTE AT WASHINGTON.

RESIGNATION OF REV. MR. KENNARD, PASTOR OF THE E-STREET CHURCH—A ROW AMONG THE MEMBERS—VICTORY OF THE REBEL SYMPATHIZERS.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Monday, May 12, 1862.

Rev. Mr. KENNARD, Pastor of the E-street Baptist Church of this city, after a sermon on Sunday morning, from the text in Psalms: "The Mountains shall bring peace," announced his decision to resign his pastoral charge, and requested the Church to consider its acceptance at its earliest convenience. He said the cause which had led him to that determination was known to the members all, and he should not state it; that he should have taken the same action months ago, only that he had been dissuaded from it by the advice of judicious brethren in the church and out, clergy and laity, who thought it his duty to strive still longer to promote peace and the interests of the church; but now, after that further trial, without consultation with or advice from any one, and independently of the action of any other person, he had come to a settled conviction that he could not conduce to the peace of the church, and that his work there was at an end. He was not now disposed to single out persons and faults to attribute the difficulties to; his prayers had been for the peace and prosperity of the church, and they should be continued when his connection with it should have ceased.

This is really a secessionist disturbance. We understand that when the rebellion broke out, this church, like others of the city, lost much of its moneyed support, by the stampeding of persons into Secessia. So little was left that the pastor temporarily combined a clerkship in the Treasury Department with his pulpit and pastoral labors, in order to eke out his church income into an adequate support. Meantime Northern men gradually came in and replaced the fugitives. Up to this time undisputed sway had been held by those who believed in the divine nature of the peculiar institution; but now, what were left of this school were becoming alarmingly in the minority for the safety and perpetuity of the peace that "reigns in Warsaw;" and at every succeeding application for admission to the church upon letters from other churches north, the fixtures became flustered, and showed indecent haste to find faults as pretexts for exclusion. One applicant was objected to, for example, because he had been heard to say that there were Secessionists in the church, although the assertion was not alleged to be untrue. This conduct, which was at first resisted only by a quiet waiting for decisions in due course upon their application, at last excited expressions of dissatisfaction and revolt. One new member, previously very quiet, at last arose in a church meeting and indignantly reprobated certain conduct, which was described so as to identify the author without naming him. After meeting, while a dozen members or so were having a parting word in the vestibule, a brother of the rebuked member came up to the rebuker, and told him that if it had been he so spoken of, he would have flogged him—to that effect—and being a much larger man, it was not talking beyond his warrant. The other replied, "If you should try that I would cowhide you," at which the larger man slapped the other in the face. Friends interfered and separated them.

This was deemed a scandal upon the church not to be allowed to pass without the prompt and most emphatic disavowal, and for that purpose the church meeting was called. At this meeting the friends of the offender rallied in their greatest numbers and influence, and moved and carried the adjournment of the meeting. That was considered a test vote, not of the relative numbers, but of the spirit of the aggressors, and the friends of freedom of opinion, order and the sanctity of their place of worship, it is understood, have given up the contest and have pretty generally made up their minds to withdraw and go where they can find peace; so that, although the pastor is the only one who has made public such a determination, it is highly probable he will leave but a minority of his church behind. Rev. Mr. KENNARD is a Philadelphian, the son of a Baptist clergyman of Philadelphia, and is by no means an "Abolitionist," but he evidently doesn't relish anything so much like Slavery so near home.

☞ RACHEL's jewels, presented to her by European potentates, are offered for sale, as will be seen in the [illegible] of Mr. Bennett, Continental, who venture have been prepared to attack Washington they [illegible] Tattnall and his accomplices have gifted with prophetic knowledge and cool courage, they would have known before lightening her whether they could be so confidently expected to get her up the river. If we, then, as brave men, having their cause at heart, they should have tried to get her out to sea. A failure need have resulted in no worse result than the one they deliberately ventured, excepting the personal risk to themselves; and that risk it was their duty to incur. If the information which I get is true, the effort would have had more chances of success than failure. On the whole, we are well rid of the monster, and I trust we never may see her like again—in the hands of an enemy.

As usual, the Government was unfortunate in its dispatches from Fortress Monroe, announcing the fall of Norfolk. First, we were told that the Navy-yard was saved; then when the agent of the Associated Press proposed a dispatch giving the facts, it was suppressed because it contradicted the one already sent. Finally, the truth had to be told. We really saved scarcely anything; the hospital, itself, was only spared by the rebels because it was occupied by their own sick and wounded. They did, however, leave us a large quantity of iron ware—anchors, &c.—and one fine gunboat, on the ways, and all ready for plating; which was certainly very kind or very stupid in them.

THE CASE OF EDWIN JAMES, ESQ.

Large Meeting of the Bar at the Astor House—Interesting Statement of Mr. Edwin James in His Own Defence—Resolutions Censuring Mr. James and Censuring the Law Committee.

Several hundred members of the Bar collected in the Ladies' Ordinary of the Astor House, yesterday afternoon, pursuant to a general understanding that the case of EDWIN JAMES, E. P., would be considered, and that an explanation would be made on his behalf. Among the remarkable lawyers present were Judge McCUNN, John H. WHITE, Judge HEARN, Levi S. CHATFIELD, Judge McCARTHY, Benjamin GOLDSMITH, F. J. SCHLEIGHTER, Geo. C. BENNETT, James E. SLAYTER, Peter E. SWEENEY, J. M. HARRINGTON, Wm. H. LE BARON, and others of equal note.

Mr. WM. M. AIKEN called the meeting to order, and nominated for Chairman Mr. HENRY BREWSTER, who was chosen unanimously.

Mr. BREWSTER, on taking the Chair, said that he hardly knew this meeting would be called until yesterday. He dropped in accidentally, and had not expected to preside. He supposed the object of the meeting was to hear an explanation from Mr. JAMES in relation to the recent action of the Law Committee with reference to his admission to practice. He supposed Mr. JAMES would make that explanation which they were all so anxious to hear.

MR. JAMES' SPEECH.

Mr. JAMES thereupon rose, and was received with great applause. He is a stout, full-faced, massive-featured, solid-looking Englishman, who seems to bear, in every lineament, the evidences of his nationality. His voice is quite soothing and persuasive, and his entire manner calculated to engross the attention as well as enlist the sympathies of the listener. He labored evidently under deep emotion, and frequently became overpowered by his feelings during the delivery of his remarkably clear statement. He was listened to with earnest attention, and received throughout the warm sympathies of his audience.

Mr. JAMES said it was the first time that he had had the honor to appear before any meeting of American gentlemen. He trusted the occasion would elicit a great deal of kindness and sympathy from all who heard him, viz: the attacks made upon him, which he would show to have been prompted in the country he had left, by feelings of the most malignant animosity. The arrows which had been sent from the country he had left were barbed and poisoned by gentlemen who pursued him in a manner on which he wished to take the sense of this meeting. [Applause.] He came to give in the most open manner, any explanation which any honorable gentleman could ask of another, as to the infamous libels which had cruelly pursued him. He arrived in this country in August last. It was known in England that he intended to come to this country. It appeared in the public journals, that he was about seeking honorable practice where he should receive more generously and more liberally than in that land where the shadow of aristocracy frowns upon any man who dares to be independent. [Applause.] It appeared in the public journals that at the proper period he should apply for admission to the Bar of the City and State of New-York, and he remained here studying our Constitution, and on Nov. 5 was admitted by the Supreme Court of the State a member of the Bar of the State of New-York. [Applause.] It had come to his knowledge, on the evening of the day of his admission, that two gentlemen had endeavored to insert in the public journals a protest to his admission; but, as the names of his assailants were not given, he could take no notice of the matter. No man could deal with the dark assassins of his reputation. [Applause.] He had since learned that these two assailants were part of the Committee of Five who had assailed him. But he had told his informant that he would wait two weeks before enrolling his name, and if his accusers wished, they could appear before the Court and state the reasons why he should not be admitted. He waited the two weeks and no one appeared against him. These attacks on him had been dark and insidious, and came from the other side, and he traced them to an English gentleman, enjoying our hospitality like himself, Mr. CHARLES EDWARDS, who was at the bottom of them. [Applause, hisses and confusion.] He was here to attack no individual and for no purpose of personal vituperation. He should refer to his case only with a view to sustain his own honesty, honor and dignity. His admission to the bar was completed on the 23d of November, and he appeared in Court shortly afterwards. In February of the same year he was admitted to practice in the United States Courts, and had occasion for thankfulness to his friend Chief J. Edmonds, Esq., for his kindly offices. On the 14th of February he received the letter which had already been published—the letter from a high-minded, honorable gentle, (Judge EDMONDS,) who was ashamed that such a course had been adopted toward him (Mr. JAMES,) who had not done any wrong since he had been here. [Applause.] The result of the correspondence was satisfactory to Judge EDMONDS, and he (Mr. JAMES) supposed that there the attacks would cease. He was astonished, therefore, at receiving the letter from the Law Institute which had been already published. Thus, six months after he was admitted to practice he was called to answer to defamatory charges and libels written in the Law Magazine of England, by a personal enemy, who was striving for the place he had left. To this day, he was ignorant of the charges which had been laid before the Court by the Law Institute. Was that to be allowed in this free country? Should a man be kept in ignorance of the charges made against him? [Cries of No, No, and applause.] His opinion of the English Government's conduct in the Trent affair, had been widely denounced by the English legal Press, and had caused the bitter animosity which had been aroused against him. He still held to his opinion regarding the conduct of England in that affair. [Great applause.] What would have been the manly and straightforward course for his accusers to take? He had nothing to do with any self-constituted tribunal—(applause)—but if Mr. LORD was present, and he believed he was, he should be happy to have him come forward, and ask any questions he pleased. [Great applause; cries for "LORD," and confusion.]

Judge McCUNN—They dare not come here and face him. They have not the manliness to do it. They are sneaks.

Mr. JAMES said that Mr. DANIEL LORD, or any one of his accusers, was welcome to come forward and question him on the spot.

A VOICE—No, no! Not now.

THE CHAIR—I hope no gentleman will interrupt the speaker.

Mr. JAMES—Let them speak now, or ever after hold their peace. He wanted to meet his accusers in public. Three charges in these papers, that were presented in his absence, constituted the features of the charges which had been brought against him: First, that he became involved with the son of a noble Lord in pecuniary transactions. That was true. But they were purely personal and private transactions, which did not interfere with his right, or capacity, or character, as a lawyer—nothing to do with his position at the bar. He and that noble Lord had been intimate friends—members of the same House of Commons, and of the same Club. He was told that this cabal which pursued him had referred to this case to his dishonor, but, what more could he have done? He had given his all in satisfaction of his debts as far as he was able, every thing, even to his library and family plate and testimonials that had been presented to him. He yielded up everything he had to give. Instead of being a "fugitive insolvent," he had, before leaving, called every one of his creditors together, and told them of his plans, and they had all not only consented to his leaving, but he had letters from several, wishing him success and prosperity. It was not true that he was a fugitive insolvent.

But, an article in a morning paper asked, "What did he leave for?" [Here Mr. JAMES evinced great emotion.] It was a painful duty, but, he would tell them. It was painful to look back upon one's ruin. He represented, and had the confidence of, the second largest constituency in England—that of Marylebone. He had worked his way to the bar by honor and independence. The Judges disliked him because he was not servile and subservient, and, he was told that in the course he took in the Barnard case, where he boarded them, and told them they were trying a man upon grounds that were illegal and unconstitutional, he would be made to suffer. He represented a large constituency. They were aware that that relic of barbarism, imprisonment for debt, still existed in England. A member of Parliament was exempt, but he addressed a letter to his constituents, telling them that he would scorn to represent them for such protection. He called his creditors together and arranged with them, and he had a letter in his possession signed by every one of them. It was not his creditors, but a cabal that had circulated these reports against him. He had the sanction of every one of his creditors for the course he adopted. He had no means in the world, but a lady, who had been attached to him for years, who knew his position, declared to him for the first time that her heart had been his, and placed an independent fortune, not at his disposal, but to be shared with him. [Applause.] But it was said that he had been guilty of conduct at the Bar unworthy a member of the profession, in relation to his borrowing money of a Mr. INGRAM, who was defendant in a suit, in which he was counsel for the plaintiff. This was one of the libels in the law magazine which Mr. LORD had thought proper to lay before the Court. Mr. INGRAM was a Member of Parliament for Boston, and sat in the House at the same time with himself. He, Mr. JAMES, was retained as counsel in a suit brought by Mr. SCULLY, a member for Cork, who charged that INGRAM had misrepresented to the late Mr. JOHN SADLIER, to the extent of 2,000 pounds. He (Mr. JAMES) succeeded in the case, and obtained for Mr. SCULLY a verdict of 200 pounds. That was in February, 1860. A new trial was ordered, which took, in the regular practice, about a year to reach. In the meantime, in March, he (Mr. JAMES) was a candidate for the large borough of Marylebone. Election contests in England were an expensive luxury. [Great laughter.] He did not know what they were here, and probably never should, if his friend Mr. LORD should ever succeed in expatriating him. [Laughter.]

A VOICE—Shame, it can't be Christian.

Mr. JAMES—Shame, it can be Christian.

He was known that his opponent had been extremely heavy. INGRAM was a member of his committee, was well-known, and canvassed to the minster, and was one of few gentlemen—three of them members of Parliament—who agreed to assist him by the loss of £2,000—£1,000 each. He defeated, by several thousand, the Government candidate, Lord JOHN RUSSELL's nephew. [Applause.] They never forgave him that to the hour he left England. He was at one time a Whig, but found that the Whigs were the cold aristocracy, and that unless a man was a nephew or relative of some nobleman poor, he did not stand a chance. [Applause.] These friends did subscribe their £1,000 each, and, after consulting with a member of the House of Commons, whether it would be proper for him to take the loan from INGRAM under the circumstances, he took it. Not a word ever passed the lips of either, as to the time in which he (Mr. JAMES) was counsel and Mr. INGRAM defendant. Mr. INGRAM was unfortunately drowned in this country in 1860, and six months after his death, when the probate of his will was taken out, the acknowledgment of the debt was discovered. All the other subscribers were paid. He (Mr. SCULLY) never doubted that he (JAMES) did his duty in the case. The case came up for a second trial in the following February, and he (JAMES) opened the case against INGRAM. His defamers had suppressed the verbatim report of his speech, in which he charged INGRAM with defrauding the plaintiff of £2,000. The case was referred, and he (Mr. JAMES) got a verdict for Mr. SCULLY of £2,000. The suit cost Mr. INGRAM £10,000, and Mr. SCULLY personally thanked him (Mr. JAMES) for his efforts. He (Mr. JAMES) did not complain, but the cabal did. They little knew what a young struggling man had to contend with in England. They had had executions in the houses of Judges and Lord Chancellors, but when a man has obtained his position he was soulless, but must struggle for position against the aristocracy. He was ready to answer any of the gentlemen present, and give any explanation of the accusations against him. He was here appealing to the Bar and to the higher tribunal of public opinion. His case was not without a precedent, for THOMAS AIRDS EMMETT had been persecuted in the same way from the same cowardly source—England. [Applause.] EMMETT was a greater man, but not more persecuted than himself. There was at that time Daniel Lords at the bottom of the persecution. EMMETT lived to make Chancellor KETT regret that he had opposed him. He made the Daniel Lords of that day cower before him. [Applause.] It appeared that there was a second Daniel come to judgment. [Laughter.] EMMETT lived as he hoped to live, to obtain the verdict of their grand opinion, and to change even narrow professional rivalry into esteem and regard. [Great applause, during which Mr. JAMES sat down.]

Mr. JOHN H. WHITE offered the following resolution:

The members of the legal profession of the City of New-York, convened at the Astor House on public notice, to take action on the recent proceedings of a few members of the Bar, claiming to represent the Law Institute of this City, to revoke the license of Mr. EDWIN JAMES, do hereby Resolve, That Mr. EDWIN JAMES, having been duly admitted to practice at the opening of the November Term, 1861, of the Supreme Court, and having since that time been an active practitioner in our several judicial tribunals, has conducted himself as a high-minded and honorable member of the profession, and has earned our respect and esteem for his distinguished learning, fairness and courtesy, as a lawyer and a man.

The resolution was seconded.

Mr. LOWREY said, I am bound to confess that I came here with some prejudice—drawn from popular representations—against Mr. JAMES. So far as his professional conduct has been concerned, they are removed. Such being the case, I am impelled to say, in behalf of my young brothers of the Bar, that we feel that we are most interested in this matter. We are the heirs of the reputation of the Bar, and it is well-known that the heir may interpose to prevent waste of his inheritance. I do not doubt that the motives of these gentlemen who have instituted these proceedings, are pure and upright; but, if a man does not always increase with his years, we must look to it, that our estate comes to us unimpaired in all parts. It is right that our seniors should see that every member of the Bar is honorable; but we must see, also, that every man is just. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this meeting appoint another committee, whose duty it shall be to relieve Mr. JAMES from the onerous and painful responsibility of his defence, and without the spirit of partizanship to him or to any one, to guard our good name from the imputation that we struck, but did not hear.

Mr. LEVI S. CHATFIELD said that he looked upon the circumstances in the case of Mr. JAMES, and he could not find anything that needed any explanation. But the statement offered voluntarily by Mr. JAMES was satisfactory, and in his opinion, needed no further action of the Bar or Court.

Mr. CHATFIELD then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That although no explanations from Mr. JAMES were necessary, still the explanations having been given are eminently satisfactory, and need no further inquiry at the hands of the Counsellors of Bar.

Mr. SUMNER then asked Mr. JAMES if the letter to Mr. INGRAM was not in relation to his subscription to the election fund?

Mr. JAMES replied that it was.

The chair then put the question on Messrs. WHITE's and CHATFIELD's resolutions, which were both carried.

Mr. MALCOLM CAMPBELL introduced a resolution, deprecating the course of the Committee of the Law Institute. In doing so he stated that he was a member of the Law Institute, and had no notice of the proposed course to be taken with relation to Mr. JAMES.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Addresses were made by Mr. SHERWOOD, Judge HEARN, and others, and the meeting broke up with three cheers for Mr. JAMES. At the conclusion of the meeting, several members of the Bar came up and shook hands with Mr. JAMES, and congratulated him on the stand he had taken.

GENERAL CITY NEWS.

THE LAST MOMENTS OF CANTERBURY MUSIC HALL.—It would have been impossible for the action of the State Legislature, with regard to the sale of liquors in places of public amusement, to have been more speedy in its operations. Several of the smaller pustules upon the social condition of New-York, it effaced immediately, and on Thursday last, the most prominent of the plague-blotches in our daily life was forever, as we sincerely trust, obliterated. We of course allude to the Canterbury Music Hall. Those luxurious embellishments of the saloon which had been provided to heighten its temptations to the younger and lower portion of our citizens were on Thursday finally dispersed by the auctioneer's hammer. Surgeons had been of no benefit to the patient. Its constitution had been so rapidly broken up, that the last official had been summoned by its friends to "lay it out," as decently as possible. We are happy to say that the mourners were few, with the exception of those more immediately concerned. In other words, the auction was scantily attended. Large plate mirrors—these surrounded the walls of the saloon—fetched fabulously low prices. The smaller mirrors, on the exterior of the boxes, averaged fifty to seventy-five cents apiece. Chairs went for a mere song. Everything exposed for sale, tempting as its appearance and actual value might be, brought in a merely nominal amount. For the first time since these social ulcers sprung into existence, we looked upon one of them. Let us hope that its extinction was final and complete.

HOSPITALS FOR THE WOUNDED ON STATEN ISLAND.—The State has taken the hospitals recently built at Quarantine for the sick and wounded soldiers. They are located on one of the most delightful spots upon the island. The buildings are admirably constructed and thoroughly furnished, and the ladies of the island are actively employed superintending the fitting up of beds, providing suitable delicacies and reading matter for the invalids. The medical gentlemen of the island, through their Society, offered their services gratuitously to take charge of the hospitals, and the offer has been accepted—the Society appointing Drs. Boardman, Anderson, Eadie, Richardson, Cavelti, Munday, Burdette, and Lee, who have acquiesced cheerfully in the wishes of their professional brethren. Dr. GURR, the Health Officer; Dr. WALKER, his Assistant, and Dr. MOFFATT, of the Sailors' Retreat, have also united in tendering their services.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.—Coroner WILDEY held an inquest, yesterday, upon the body of ANTHONY HEANY, who was found dead in the Fourth Ward Station, on Saturday night. The investigation revealed the fact that deceased did not come to his death from the effects of liquor, as it was at first supposed. The verdict of the Jury was that he died of "pulmonary apoplexy."....The same Coroner held an inquest upon the body of ALVEN HOLMES, aged 60 years, who was found drowned at the foot of Fourth-street, East River, yesterday afternoon.....Also upon a child, aged 15 months, who was scalded by accident, at No. 246 Second-avenue.....The body of an unknown man, very much decomposed, was found yesterday afternoon in the East River, at the foot of Delancey-street. It had been in the water several months.

PARSON BROWNLOW.

His Address in the Brooklyn Academy of Music Last Evening—A Crowded House and an Enthusiastic Audience.

Parson BROWNLOW delivered an address in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening, under the auspices of the Mercantile Library Association. The house was filled a long time before the hour appointed for the address to be commenced, and many persons went away because they were unable to obtain seats.

The Eighth Regiment Navy-yard band, J. MANN, leader, having volunteered its services, was present, and performed several patriotic and national airs during the evening.

The stage back of the speaker was entirely occupied by well-known citizens, representing all parties and every shade of political bias, and almost every profession to boot.

The appearance of Parson BROWNLOW, at a little past 8 o'clock, was the signal for an outburst of applause more cordial than is generally witnessed, even in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. He was accompanied by His Honor Mayor KALBFLEISCH, Ex-Mayor HALL, Gen. KLAPP, John B. KEENAN, Esq., President of the Mercantile Library Association, Hon. JAMES S. T. STRANAHAN, and others.

Mr. KENNEDY stepped forward to the foot-lights, and said that although the invitation to Mr. BROWNLOW to deliver an address had been extended by the Mercantile Library Association, it was nevertheless intended that their distinguished guest should be received by the whole people of Brooklyn, and with that view His Honor the Mayor would preside.

Mayor KALBFLEISCH, upon taking the chair, in the briefest manner possible introduced Mr. BROWNLOW, who was welcomed with cheers, clapping of hands, and other demonstrations of satisfaction.

Mr. BROWNLOW's address was substantially a repetition of the one delivered by him in New-York on Thursday night last. He said he was no orator, and expressed a doubt of his ability to meet the expectations of so large and intelligent an audience as he saw before him, but had nevertheless been accustomed to expressing his opinion upon every subject that came before the public for thirty-five years—until three and a half years ago, when he lost his voice, and it was only restored to him when he commenced speaking for the Union in Cincinnati. He had made a pilgrimage, several years ago, to New-York to have his sinew throat operated upon, but the Secessionists wanted to operate upon the entire, and that he objected to. Mr. BROWNLOW said he was born in Virginia—his father and grandfather before him—in the same county in which J. B. FLOYD first saw the light; he was poor, because he had always been honest; FLOYD was rich, because he commenced stealing when a boy. He (the speaker,) was the first gentleman from Virginia the audience had ever seen, who denounced from one of the second families. All that he had ever done across were of the "F. F. V's." This was now interpreted to mean "Fleet-Footed Virginians" for the soldiers of his native State have proved that they are fleet-footed, and can out-run the Yankees, particularly if they get a little start, as they generally have done. He was a Southern man, and had been an advocate of the peculiar institution, and he intended to fight the Secessionists where they say, in the ditch, which he helped to dig, near the Gulf of Mexico. The South seemed to be crazy upon the subject of Slavery and holding slaves in the Territories, but so far as he was concerned, (and he would utter the same opinion everywhere,) he held that the Government ought to protect loyal men, North and South, in the enjoyment of their property of every description, even including negroes; and he hoped that the Government would confiscate everything belonging to rebels, including negroes; and by the Gods, in her madness and folly—if they will persist this phrenzy and force upon the Union Slavery or no Union, he was for the Union and no Slavery! He was an unconditional Union man, and though it cost millions of dollars and oceans of blood, he was for subjugation and extermination, if the Union cannot be preserved in any other way, and for having the South peopled with another race of men. These sentiments were vociferously applauded.

Mr. BROWNLOW next referred to his experience in South Carolina in nullification times; the last Presidential campaign; the control the South had always had over the Government; his contempt for Northern men with Southern principles; the Fugitive Slave law; repeal of the Missouri Compromise; admission of Texas; and said the Southerners should be the last people to complain, if things had not gone on right. He spoke of the course of the KNOXVILLE Whig—the last Union, and the only religious paper in the eleven seceded States, when it was crushed. He had done no more than it was the duty of every man to do, and he who would not hazard all for the sake of the Union does not deserve the name of American citizen. He described with some particularity the course the Secessionist leaders pursued to drag one State after another into the whirlpool of secession; the editors of Union papers were bought up with money—and what was more humiliating than all the rest, with the meanest paper on God's earth—Confederate money. He predicted that when the people of Tennessee had an opportunity to vote upon the question, they would give 50,000 majority in favor of the Union; he knew whereof he spoke. Louisiana never voted to leave the Union; there was a small majority for the Union, but they lied the State out contrary to all order. The whole rebellion had for its only foundation lying, swearing and stealing. Referring to the course of the fourteen Senators representing the Cotton States in the last Congress, he said they caught to have their tongues cut out. There was a strong Union sentiment in Georgia. That State was carried out by fraud. There was a powerful Union sentiment in North Carolina and Alabama. It strikes you, perhaps, he said, to ask why no more Union sentiment was manifested in these States. His answer was that the people were not yet satisfied that the Union forces will be able to keep their foothold. When this doubt was removed, there would be a large Union feeling manifested. There was at this time a Union organization in Memphis of 3,000 men—a secret organ

The plaintiff is a citizen of New-York, the defendants are a corporation created by and doing business in Connecticut. The action is brought to recover $633 22, with interest from 19th January, 1860, upon a claim alleged to have been assigned to the plaintiff by Josiah M. Colburn. On 14th December, 1861, the defendants entered their appearance in this Court, and at the same time filed a petition for the removal of the cause into the Circuit Court of the United States for this District, and offered a bond, with sureties duly executed and approved, for entering in the Circuit Court, as required by statute, copies of the pleadings and of the record in the cause. Upon this petition and bond, and the affidavit by the agent of the corporation, showing that the cause was brought by the Officers of the Customs, from two passengers who arrived from Europe on board the steamship Africa, which plaintiff claimed to be the same as Grainger, came in evidence, and the bond by the name of Grainger, came in evidence, and the bond by the name of Grainger, came in evidence, and the bond by the name of PRIVATE CONSULTATION.—DR. HUNTER has, for thirty years, confined his attention to diseases of a certain class, in which he has treated no less than fifty thousand cases, without an instance of failure. His great remedy, HUNTER'S BED DROP, cures certain in two days; cures without dieting or restriction in the habits of the patient; cures without the disgusting and sickening effects of all other remedies; cures in new cases in less than six hours; cures without the dreadful consequent effects of mercury, but possesses the peculiarly valuable property of annihilating the rank and poisonous taint that has always baffled all other means. Its remedy is perfect. This is what he claims for it, and what he can fully accomplish. Its value in this respect has become so well known, that scientific men in every department of medical knowledge begin to appreciate it, for hardly a week passes that he is not consulted by druggists, chemists and physicians, in regard to some pitiful patient, who has exhausted the whole field of the faculty, and still the disease will spread, so popularly is so great that there is not a quack house in the City that has not attempted it, and when they find their lies are not so easily swallowed, they then pretend that they can make it. It is $1 a vial, and cannot be obtained genuine anywhere but at the old office, No. 3 Division-st. Book for 25 three-cent stamps, 200 pages, 100 colored illustrations. The best work out.

FROM GEN. HALLECK'S ARMY.

The Negotiations of the Rebels Regarding the Pending Battle.

MORE REPORTS OF DESERTERS.

A Rumor that Beauregard Wants an Armistice of Ten Days.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CAMP ON THE CORINTH ROAD, MISS., Saturday, May, 17.

The Memphis papers, of the 14th inst., are looking for the great battle at Corinth with terrible interest. Only outside the National Army at sixty thousand, and more than it is greatly demoralized. They say they do not allow themselves to think of being defeated.

Discussion is undoubtedly still at Corinth.

REPORTS FROM OTHER CORRESPONDENTS.

CAMP NEAR CORINTH, Friday, May 16.

Colonel Fouchelman, a member of the Thirteenth Louisiana, has arrived. Three companies of Fouchelman, composed of Frenchmen, arrived lately, who were unable to obtain work, food, or money, and who were obliged to enlist. Under the thirty days' provisional law, they were compelled to enlist for the war. He reports the whole army without coffee—at Camp Near Door and Pamm left Corinth eight days ago. It is not known where they have gone. The weather is thousand hot, and the roads are very dusty.

BIVOUAC CORINTH, Friday, May 16.

It having been satisfactorily shown that spies have visited our camp, crossed the Tennessee River, and proceeded on in the night by "dug outs" to Florence, Ala., where they held easy communication with the enemy, it was deemed necessary to exclude all civilians from the camps in order to exclude spies; hence the general order mentioned yesterday.

An intelligent National Sergeant, captured at Sillish and exchanged yesterday, says he was taken from Corinth to Jackson, Miss., thence to Jackson, Tenn., and back to Corinth. He states that from the time he left Corinth until his return there, he was guarded by cavalrymen.

A Contraband, the intimate friend of Gen. HALLECK's servant, Jack, has also arrived. He reports that it has been the talk that HALLECK was very sick of the work and caught, leave, but BEAUREGARD would not let him.

CORINTH, Friday, May 16.

A special to the Tribune, from Cairo, says:

"The steamer Gladiator, from Pittsburgh, has arrived. There was a rumor that Gen. BEAUREGARD had sent a flag of truce to Gen. HALLECK, asking an armistice of ten days. This was subsequently corroborated by deserters, who said the matter was under consideration when the Gladiator left."

CORINTH, Saturday, May 17.

A special from Cairo says:

The steamer Meteor, from Pittsburgh Landing, has arrived. Gen. POPE's Division has again advanced, and now rests three miles from Corinth. Deserters report that a great deal of hard feeling exists between the Missouri and Tennessee troops and those from the Southern States. The former were urging that they have nothing to fight for, their States having been restored to the Union, and they see no reason why they should be compelled to fight for the independence of the Cotton States.

FROM THE MISSISSIPPI FLOTILLA.

Arrival of Capt. Davis and Departure of Commodore Foote—Affecting Scenes on the Flagship Benton—Late and Important News from the South—Brilliant Naval Engagement on the Mississippi—Attack and Repulse of the Rebel Gunboat Fleet—Injuries to the Gunboats Cincinnati and Mound City, Etc.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

MISSISSIPPI FLOTILLA, NEAR FORT PILLOW, Saturday, May 10, 1862.

The last twenty-four hours have been full of exciting and important events. Capt. CHARLES H. DAVIS, recently ordered West, has arrived, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as Flag-officer of the flotilla; Commodore FOOTE has somewhat unexpectedly taken his departure for the East; a flag of truce has arrived from Fort Pillow, bringing late and important news from Memphis; and last, though not least, we have had a brilliant engagement with the rebel gunboat fleet, resulting in the complete and speedy repulse of the enemy. The echo of the guns has hardly died away as I write.

The arrival of Capt. DAVIS, whose gallantry at Fort Royal is yet fresh in the memory of your readers, was not unexpected; and although he reached the flotilla of a very early hour in the morning, when the stars were still smiling serenely in the quiet sky and sparkling in the depths of the surging river, a tug was in readiness to convey him to the flagship, where he met with a warm welcome from his old and tried friend, the Commodore, at whose earnest solicitation he was detailed to his present duties. The two remained in close conference for several hours, when the officers of the different gun and mortar boats were sent for, and formally presented to their new Commander.

Capt. DAVIS is a man about fifty years old, five feet eleven inches high, of spare but well-knit frame, and evidently possessed of great powers of endurance. His looks, as a friend remarked, not unlike Colonel Baker, in the fifth act of "The Lady of Lyons." His hair is rather thin, and was originally of a flaxen hue, but is now well besprinkled with gray. His whiskers are cut a la militaire, and are short, thin, and very white, while his mustache is several shades darker and quite heavy. In his prominent forehead, clear blue eye, fine large Roman nose, and well-cut mouth, one cannot fail to read the man of character. He has made a very favorable impression upon all who have seen him.

Much heartfelt sorrow was expressed throughout the flotilla when it became known that Commodore FOOTE had resolved to return East immediately. Nearly every one was surprised at the intelligence, for it was understood that Capt. DAVIS had been sent here to assist the Commodore, and not to relieve him entirely, as the latter had requested. The gallant old commander, however, is no greatly enfeebled, and continues to suffer so much from his honorable wound received at Fort Henry, that he had began to regard himself as a hindrance rather than a help to the flotilla; and therefore, when he felt the responsibility of his position rolled away, like a great stone, from his shoulders, it is not strange that he should have determined to withdraw from these irksome scenes with as little delay as possible, and seek that retirement and composure which alone can restore him to health—not, he said, that he was unwilling to lay down his poor life at any time his country demanded it, but because his better judgment assured him that he was standing in the way of his country's best interests so long as he retained command of the flotilla in his present enfeebled condition. Especially was this the case when a vigorous, energetic and competent man, like Capt. DAVIS, stood ready to step into his responsible shoes, and add fresh laurels to those already won by the gallant man under his command.

Above three o'clock, the officers and crew of the flagship, with a few exceptions, were aroused from their slumbers by the sound of the Commodore's barge, which the Commodore himself was pulling with a vigorous hand, preparatory to leaving the flagship for the last time. Soon the crew were all on deck, and the Commodore, who had taken a long and affectionate farewell of his officers in his cabin, came on deck, uncovered his head and spoke a few words of farewell to his men, who crowded the decks of the flagship to see him off. The scene was affecting in the extreme. The Commodore was agitated and very nervous. He looked committed and worn, his big frame shaken, and frequently raised a pocket-handkerchief to his face to conceal the briny drops which would force themselves, in spite of all he could do, from his sunken eyes and roll down his hollow cheeks. As the packet moved off, he rose to say a few words, but the blasting of the steam prevented him from being distinctly heard. We could only catch such disjointed sentences as, "God bless you!" "You are engaged in a holy cause!" "I know you will succeed!" etc. Then Lieut.-Commanding PEARCE said, "Now, three hearty cheers, my lads," and they were given with a will, although the poor tars felt more like weeping than cheering. The order was certainly in bad taste, but the applause was infectious, and the crews of other gunboats took it up and made the welkin ring, till the steamer turned the point and was lost to view.

The Commodore had intended to leave at 5 o'clock instead of 4, but just before the appointed hour arrived, a rebel tug was discovered coming up the river, bearing a flag of truce. Speculation was rife as to what could be its import, when Lieut. PEARCE stepped on board one of our tugs and started down to meet it. In a short time he returned, accompanied by two of our surgeons, captured at the battle of Belmont, one of whom had been exchanged, and the other released on his parole. The former, named E. W. A. GOODEN, was surgeon of the Thirty-first Illinois Regiment, and the latter, whose name I could not learn, held a similar position in the Thirtieth Regiment, from the same State.

These officers were in Memphis the greater part of the Winter, where they found many friends, and were well treated. In March they were sent further South, and moved from place to place for several weeks, during which they fared badly, and were then returned to Memphis. Dr. GORDON's exchange was effected several weeks ago, but the rebel authorities would not release him for fear he was in possession of valuable information concerning their strength in the vicinity of Corinth, which might be used injuriously to their cause.

Both gentlemen are confident they do not exaggerate when they say there are two Unionists in Memphis to one rebel. When they left, Commodore FARRAGUT's gunboats were reported to be at Natchez, and the work of destroying the rebel stores in Memphis had commenced. Several hundred bales of cotton had been burned, and a quantity of sugar rolled into the river. There are said to be hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of these Southern staples on the Memphis bluffs, most of which might be secured by a rapid advance of the flotilla. No fears were entertained that the city would be destroyed by fire in the event of its occupation by the National troops.

The notorious JEFF. THOMPSON was a fellow passenger with our released friends as far as Fulton, three miles below Fort Pillow. JEFF. is represented to be intensely democratic, and, as the world goes, rather a good sort of fellow.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Since writing the foregoing I have made a round of the flotilla to ascertain some particulars of the engagement this morning, so that I might be able to give your readers a reliable and intelligible account of the affair.

The fight commenced at ten minutes past 7 o'clock, and lasted thirty-five minutes only. At the expiration of that time the rebels had pressing engagements below, which they did not feel at liberty to neglect. It is a matter of general regret that they were not able to remain with us a little longer, and the more sanguine among us hope that they may be induced to renew their visit at some other time when they will have more leisure.

About 7 o'clock the Cincinnati, Capt. STRIBLING, which was anchored in the stream as a support to the mortarboats, some distance below the remainder of the gunboats, observed the rebel fleet coming round the point. First, a two-masted schooner, (the McRae,) with her machinery protected by iron and bales of cotton piled up on her bows and stern, and around the pilot-house; and then, close in her wake, a clumsy-looking craft, (the Van Dorn,) sheathed with railroad iron; and then another, (the Sumter,) somewhat similar in appearance, but less formidable; and then a frail-looking steamer, mounting four guns; and then another, and another, and another, and another, and another, until nine vessels in all were in sight.

The decks of the Cincinnati were promptly cleared for action, and her stern guns opened on the McRae. It soon appeared that the McRae, Van Dorn and Sumter were the famous rams, about which we had heard so much, and that the only serious opposition we would have to encounter would be from them, as the enemy's gunboats remained at a respectful distance, in what steamboat men would call the "bite of the bend." The sharp, crashing report of the Cincinnati's guns, so different from that of the mortars, aroused the entire flotilla. On came the rams, at a good rate of speed, the McRae still in the advance and all heading for the isolated gunboat, with the view of sinking her and cutting loose our mortars. As they approached within three hundred yards—all this time without firing a gun—the Cincinnati poured a fair broadside into the bow of the McRae, apparently staggering her a good deal, but doing her no serious injury.

In the meantime the Mound City, Capt. KELTY, hastened to the assistance of the Cincinnati, followed by the Carondelet and Burton, all vomiting forth shot and shell in the most terrific manner, some of which were distinctly heard striking on the iron portion of the rebel rams, or crashing through the frailer portions of the vessels. The progress of the McRae and Van Dorn, however, was not retarded. On they came within hailing distance, and a moment after the McRae struck the Cincinnati on the port quarter, just abaft of her iron, lifting her bow almost out of water, breaking her bulkhead, and causing her to leak badly. At this moment a gunner turned a 20-pounder rifled Parrot piece upon her, opening a port-hole through her from stem to stern. She drew back, however, swung around, and struck the Cincinnati again, this time on the starboard side, near the wheel-house, but without doing her any damage. By this time the Van Dorn came up, and struck the ill-fated craft in the stern, midway between the rudders. The shock was not serious, however, and before she could repeat it, the Mound City came up, when the Van Dorn turned upon her, striking her fairly on the bow, and causing her to leak badly.

At one moment the McRae and Cincinnati were almost side by side, the guns of the latter, in one instance, rubbing against the cotton on the bow of her adversary. Capt. STRIBLING ordered his men on deck, thinking the enemy intended to board his craft. His heavy guns, however, were not neglected during this time, and fairly tore the formidable schooner to pieces. While preparing to receive the enemy on deck, the Captain himself throwing hand grenades, encouraging his men, and otherwise behaving in the most gallant manner, he obtained a good view of the pilot at the wheel of the McRae, and drawing his revolver shot him dead. A moment later, as he turned to pass behind his own pilot-house, a rifle ball from the McRae struck him near one of the shoulder-blades and passing through the body came out under the chin. He was immediately carried below, and after the engagement was removed to the ammunition-boat Great Western, Capt. SAWYER, where he is the recipient of every possible attention. His recovery is extremely doubtful. The loss of this gallant officer would not be compensated for by the destruction of the entire rebel flotilla, and every man on board.

The fight had now lasted about thirty minutes—the rams were drifting away in a sinking condition and helpless—and the rebel gunboats also took advantage of the current, and were falling back. The Sumter drifted after them, swinging around slowly, giving them alternately her bow gun, and a port broadside, then her stern-guns, and then a starboard broadside. One shot evidently struck the McRae's boiler, for a moment after she was enveloped in a cloud of steam, and high above the din of battle went up a shriek. The Sumter did not pursue the enemy too far under the guns of the fort. A circumstance occurs that may interest you, later in the day, concerning the flag of truce which the Commodore sent down to the rebels. Suffice it now to state that the flag of truce, which came up yesterday, was sent down to request the rebels to remove their dead and wounded from the decks of our gunboats, and cleanse them after the white flag disappeared. We have always understood the rebel fleet to be much, that I presume it was not thought necessary to take any unusual precautions against a surprise. No one supposed for a moment that the enemy would be impudent enough to engage us in the glare of day.

It cannot be denied that their attack was a partial success, for the Cincinnati had to be towed to the bank of the river to prevent her from sinking, and will have to go on the dock before she can see service again. The Mound City, too, has an ugly hole in her bow, and may also have to undergo repairs. Nevertheless, it is equally true that the rebels were beaten off in handsome style, with the loss of the only formidable vessels they had in the river. The victory was as decisive as it was speedily won. All honor to our gallant jars, who went at their work with hearty cheers.

Our loss in the engagement was three men wounded, Capt. STRIBLING and two others, all seriously.

Capt. Davis' Report of the Late Naval Battle.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, May 17.

The following report from Capt. DAVIS, commanding the Mississippi flotilla, pro tem., was received this morning at the Navy Department:

U. S. FLAG GUNBOAT BENTON, OFF FORT PILLOW, May 11, 1862.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

I have the honor to inform the Department that yesterday morning, a little after 7 o'clock, the rebel squadron, consisting of eight iron-clad steamers, four of them I believe fitted with rams, came around the point at the bend above Fort Pillow, and steamed gallantly up the river, fully prepared for a regular engagement.

The vessels of the squadron were lying at the time tied up to the bank of the river, three on the eastern and four on the western side, and as they were transferred to me by Flag-officer FOOTE, ready for action. Most of the vessels were prompt in obeying the signal to follow the motions of the Commander-in-Chief. The leading vessels of the rebel squadron made directly for mortarboat No. 16, which was from moment unprotected.

Acting Master GREGORY and his crew behaved with great spirit during the action. He fired his mortar eleven times at the enemy, reducing the charge and diminishing the elevation.

Commander STRIBLING, in the gunboat Cincinnati, which was the leading vessel in the line, on that side of the river, followed immediately by Commander KELTY, in the gunboat Mound City, hastened to the support of the mortarboat, and were repeatedly struck by the enemy's rams, at the same time that they disabled the enemy, and drove him away.

The two leading vessels in the middle of the enemy's line were successfully encountered by this ship. The boilers or steam chest of one of them exploded by our shot, and both of them were disabled.

They as well as the first naval vessel encountered by the Cincinnati drifted down the river. Commander WALKER informs me that he fired a fifty pound rifle shot through the boilers of the third of the enemy's gunboats below the water-line, and rendered her for the time being helpless. The action lasted during the better of an hour, and took place at the closest quarters. The enemy finally retreated with haste below the guns of Fort Pillow.

I have to call the especial attention of the Department to the gallantry and good conduct exhibited by Commanders STRIBLING and KELTY, and Lieutenant-Commanding S. L. PHELPS. I regret to say that Commander STRIBLING, Fourth Master REYNOLDS, and one of the seamen of the Cincinnati, and one of the Mound City, were severely wounded. The other accidents of the day were slight.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS, Captain,

Commanding Mississippi Flotilla, pro tem.

Affairs in Kentucky.

MEASURES AGAINST VANDALISM—COTTON BURNING ITEM FOR POLITICAL ECONOMISTS—POSITION OF KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE LOYALISTS, ETC.

Correspondence of the New-York Times.

LOUISVILLE, Friday, May 9, 1862.

Every bridge or important point on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad is understood to be so well guarded by Gen. DUNCAN, that it is now called one of the safest roads in the United States. The General has instructed his subalterns to shoot on the spot any one found in the act of injuring the road or the telegraph, and to arrest, and try by Court-Martial, any suspected of being guilty of such offence. Numerous freight-cars for the Southern roads are brought through here from Ohio. Capt. SERRILL, yesterday, received some cotton from Alabama. I fear the reports about the actual and impending destruction of cotton, sugar, &c., by the secession desperadoes, may not be much exaggerated. No deed of theirs should surprise us. The South is to be desolated, irretrievably ruined by JEFF. DAVIS, TOOMBS, COBB, BENJAMIN, BEAUREGARD & Co., if in their power to do it, before she is wrested from their Nero hands, and brought back under the beneficent authority of the Union.

The Empress is returning to Pittsburgh Landing, freighted again with supplies from the Louisville Sanitary Commission. The Glendale passed up, yesterday, for Cincinnati, with three hundred more sick and wounded from the Tennessee. There are already hospital accommodations for four to five thousand, in Evansville, Henderson, Mount Vernon, Newburgh, Vincennes and Terre Haute.

Public improvements here, suspended at the time of BUCKNER's invasion, are resumed. It is a suggestive, pregnant fact, worth the attention of Kentucky economists, that the Public School Trustees of Louisville deem it necessary to contract with mechanics in Madison, Ind., for improvements and repairs on Louisville's public school-houses. Louisville engages free labor on free soil to make her school desks and benches.

The loyalists of Hart County, on the 5th, resolved that we are unalterably attached to the Government of the United States and to its institutions, and regard the action of the rebels as utterly without cause, and unnatural and wicked in the extreme; and no man in this Government may rightfully aid the enemies of the country, whether by word or deed; that we can but regard the movers and coworkers in this rebellion as traitors of the deepest dye; and, whilst we pity the masses, and would gladly have an amnesty granted them upon the only condition that they ground their arms and return to their allegiance, we demand that the real conspirators shall be made to pay the penalty for their crimes.

You know the Council of Nashville, on the 6th, passed Mr. BAKER's bill, rendering liable to a fine of $25 to $50 any person within the limits of Nashville, whose words or deeds shall be calculated to incite treason, rebellion, sedition, or to harm or offend loyal citizens of the United States.

LOUISVILLE, Saturday, May 10, 1862.

The Unionists of Simpson, Christian, Henderson, Daviess, McLean, Hancock, Hickman, Fulton, McCracken, Crittenden, Lyon, Graves, Union, Hopkins, and Livingston (composing the Fourth Appellate District,) have nominated R. K. WILLIAMS, of Graves, for the Court of Appeals, and resolved that they highly appreciate the liberality of Gen. H. TEAMAN in withdrawing from the contest, and fully approve and indorse his patriotic action in the Legislature; and that the present crisis earnestly appeals to every loyal Kentuckian to vote for no candidate for official station whose loyalty to the Federal Government and Kentucky is not above suspicion. A prominent Woodford Unionist wants all candidates to take the oath to support the Constitutions of Kentucky and the United States, and not aid in any way the rebels.

The officials in every county are called on to arrest, indict and hold to bail every man who returns from the rebel army. Mr. SUGGETT, Clerk of the Circuit Court for Franklin, publicly warns ROBERT MCKEE, HENRY E. REED, and a dozen other "Provisionals," that action is pending against them for the recovery of State revenues seized by them.

Complaints are rife that the orders of Dr. PRESTON, the Medical Superintendent of our hospitals, to outlaw all whose rebel sympathies induce them to spitter in
